For the University, a time to change

New leader to steer with Driscoll's map

By NOEL E. FALCO and DANTE J. SCALA
News Editors

New University President the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., recently said he will lead Villanova forward by following the plans his predecessor unveiled last semester.

The plans include physical expansion and development, continued "strategic planning" and analysis of programs and the largest fund raising effort in the history of the University. Former University President the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., outlined this projected course of action in a speech to the University Senate in February.

"A lot of the initiatives that we'll be taking this year might look like mine, but a lot of them will be following up" on the Driscoll agenda, said Dobbin in a July interview. Dobbin also said he worked with Driscoll to create the long-range policies.

In addition, Dobbin discussed his own views on a number of University issues. He disagreed with the Program Evaluation Committee [PEC]'s statement that research, scholarship and graduate study were secondary to undergraduate education.

Dobbin also said, "in principle, I have no problem with" coeducational dormitories.

In all, Dobbin described Villanova as a university which has been surging forward in recent years and is now in a "very good position" to "strike out for excellence" beyond what has already been achieved.

But he also noted several problems which must be solved, including low endowment and financial

Dobbin elected president

University Press Release

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A, became the 31st president of Villanova University on Sept. 1.

Dobbin previously was associate vice president for Academic Affairs.

Announcement of his election by the Board of Trustees was made June 15 by the Rev. Edward J. McCarthy, O.S.A., chairperson of the University's Board of Trustees.

McCarthy said recently that he could not release the actual vote. He added that after votes on important matters such as this, it is a practice to make a motion to make the vote unanimous.

Dobbin, 52, was chosen June 14 by the board to succeed the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A. Driscoll retired last week after 13 years as University president.

A search committee, consisting of representatives of the University community [trustees, faculty, students, administration, staff and alumni], has been meeting since February, screening and interviewing candidates for recommendation to the Board of Trustees via the Provincial.

Wildcat wrestling program pinned

Renovation of annex denied

By KEVIN C. HEIL
Assistant News Editor

The University cancelled the wrestling program "due to limitations on the University's facilities," according to a statement issued by the University Aug. 5.

In the statement, the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., former University president, said "neither the Board [of Trustees], the athletic department, nor I have been dissatisfied with the wrestling program nor its staff. In fact, we take this action with the greatest regret and would add our respect and friendship for Coach John duPont and his staff."

According to Director of Athletics Dr. Theodore A. Aceto, there had been discussion between Driscoll and duPont over renovating the Butler Annex, a building attached to the Jake Nevin Fieldhouse which is used by the wrestling team and intramural squads, and converting it into a wrestling room for the sole use of the wrestling team.

In August, the decision was announced not to renovate the Butler Annex. Aceto said that duPont felt he needed the wrestling room in order to maintain a quality program and recruit the best possible wrestlers. Aceto added that he felt the University was going to look for an alternative plan. One was not initiated, however, and the program was dropped.

The cost of refurbishing the Butler Annex was one reason for the decision, said Aceto. He added that eliminating the use of the Butler Annex by students for intramural sports and other athletic programs was another determining factor.

Four programs terminated

By DANTE J. SCALA

The Board of Trustees discontinued four of the 15 academic programs recommended for termination by the Program Evaluation Committee [PEC] at its July meeting.

The programs were the bachelor of fine arts, the bachelor of arts in theatre, the master of arts in the teaching of English and the master of secondary school science. The board also decided to restructure programs in the modern languages department.

The Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., former University president, recommended the four terminations. He was assisted by the Administrative Planning Committee [APC], a group composed of deans, vice presidents and other administrators which studied the PEC report and reactions to it from the University community.

Driscoll and the APC agreed to give the other programs threatened with termination, all graduate, time "to improve demonstrably and realistically in the areas cited" by the PEC, said Driscoll in an Aug. 29 letter to administration, faculty and staff.

The agreement by these high-ranking University officials to stay the termination of these programs, coupled with the new University president's recent statements supporting research, scholarship and graduate study, suggests that the University will continue its commitment to graduate education, at least for the time being.

"I think PEC was never conceived of as an academic doomsday machine, but rather as a valuable process to have academic pro-

Student tailgates discontinued

Student tailgates were discontinued due to stricter state laws on underage drinking, according to Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life.

By SHARON A. WATERS
Assistant News Editor

The University has discontinued pre-game tailgating this year in response to new state regulations concerning underage drinking.

According to an inter-office communication to Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, from Robert J. Martir., former assistant to the president, the revised law states, "A person commits a misdemeanor of the third degree if he intentionally and knowingly sells or intentionally and knowingly furnishes, or purchases with the intent to sell or furnish, any liquor or malt beverages to a person who is less than 21 years of age."

The state of Pennsylvania defines "furnish" as "to supply, give or provide to, or allow a minor to possess on premises or property owned or controlled by the person charged."

The minimum fine for the first violation is $1,000 and further violations result in a $2,500 fine.

According to a letter from Neville dated July 28 which informed all students of the change in the law, three trials held in Harrisburg a year ago involving "drinking by college students and its negative consequences for the underage drinker, the surrounding community and the college itself" encouraged the passing of the new liquor law.

Neville, who said the discontinuance of tailgating was a Student Life decision, consulted legal counsel and held a meeting the last week in July with faculty, students, Alumni and Athletics department representatives.

Concerning the decision to end tailgating, Neville said, "It wasn't as if we [the University] had a choice ...If we were to allow tailgating to continue, we [the University] would be breaking the law."

Neville added that if a person who had been drinking alcoholic beverages at a tailgate harmed himself or others during or after the tailgate, the University could be held partially responsible.

Neville said this liability was the real reason that the University ended the student tailgates.

Neville said he hoped the end of tailgating would not have an effect on student attendance at the football games. He said, "We don't decide whether to have tailgates or not" based on whether students will go to the games.

Students to vote — again — for government president

By DIANE A. CILIONE
Staff Reporter

Seniors Steven Ciarrocca, Sean Closkey and John Lewis registered this week as candidates in the special Student Government presidential election.

The Election Commission, headed by senior Jim Rizzo, held a meeting Tuesday in the Connelly Center, where the candidates officially began their campaigns.

At the meeting, Rizzo reviewed the rules for the special election with the candidates. "The rules for this election have been simplified because of time restrictions," said Rizzo, "but the philosphy of the elections remains the same."

Sean Closkey, Steven Ciarrocca and John Lewis announced their candidacies for Student Government president this week.

For instance, the signatures of 5 percent of students will not be required by the Election Commission for candidacy in this election, according to Rizzo.

The financial restrictions of $210 per presidential campaign have also been lifted, said Rizzo. "There is a limited amount of locations to hang posters, making the monetary restrictions not as necessary," said Rizzo. Handouts and posters may not be more than two colors, according to the new commission rules.

Tuitions continue to rise faster than inflation rate

By JENNIFER REIDY
Assistant News Editor

Average college costs will climb 7 percent this fall nationwide and a few private colleges will top the $20,000-a-year mark for the first time, according to a survey released recently by the College Board.

Tuitions thus continue to rise faster than the nation's overall inflation rate for the eighth consecutive year, reported the Newark Star-Ledger recently.

Critics in the Reagan administration and a handful of college presidents said the continued steep increases were further proof that colleges refuse to do anything about bloated bureaucracies and other waste on many campuses, the Star-Ledger also noted.

"We have stated that so far as we can see, the price of college is going to go up at this rate forever. We don't see anything in the immediate offing to exert very much restraint on these increases," said Bruce Carnes, deputy undersecretary of the U.S. Department of Education, in the article.

College officials argue they need more money to replace aging facilities, increase faculty salaries to stop professors from leaving for higher-paying jobs in private industry and to provide more financial aid for low-income students.

Campuses need to get the money from students, moreover, because state and federal governments generally have cut the amount of money they appropriate to colleges.

Last spring the University Senate approved a budget for the academic year 1988-89 which included an average 10 percent increase in tuition.

"I see nothing to reverse this trend, in regards to tuition costs rising faster than the rate of inflation, but then again, that's the nature of our business," said Gary Fenner, vice president of Financial Affairs.

"You also have to consider each college specifically. Villanova is well-received across the country, and I expect us to continue to do well," he added.

The Star-Ledger reported that average "fixed charges" at private, four-year institutions — tuition, fees and room and board — will be $11,330 for 1988-89, up 9 percent from last fall, the College Board estimated.

Adding $1,600 which the board estimates the average student spends on incidentals like books, supplies and transportation, the total budget for resident, four-year private school students will reach nearly $13,000, according to the article.

For an undergraduate, full-time day student at Villanova, the average costs of tuition and room and board will total approximately $13,400.

According to the bursar's office, tuition for the College of Arts is $4,320. Tuition for the College of Sciences and the College of Nursing is $4,460 and at the College of Engineering the tuition is $4,560.

Reading day is cancelled

One reading day has been designated a class day to make up for classes to be missed on Oct. 5, the inauguration day of new University President the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A.

All classes, including undergraduate, graduate and evening, have been cancelled "in order to allow everyone to attend the ceremonies on that day ... It is hoped that as many as possible will attend the ceremonies," said the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs, in a note to vice presidents, deans and faculty.

The first reading day scheduled for the semester, Dec. 13, will be the one affected. On that day, the University will follow the normal Wednesday schedule.

Scholarships available

The University's fellowship committee is now accepting applications for the Villanova candidates for Rhodes, Marshall and Fulbright scholarships.

Rhodes Scholarships provide two years of study at Oxford University. Thirty-two are awarded annually in the United States. Selection is based on literary and scholastic attainments, quality of character, including devotion to duty, unselfishness, and fellowship; moral force and the instinct to lead; physical vigor as shown by fondness for sports.

Marshall Scholars study at least two years in any British university. Up to 30 are awarded annually. Selection is based on distinction of character and intellect as evidenced by scholastic and other achievements; and potential to play a strong role in a British university and make a significant contribution to American society. The applicant should be prepared to present a definite program of study at specific universities.

Fulbright Scholarships provide support for a year or more abroad while engaged in independent research and study. Over 500 are given annually; competitiveness depends on the country to which you apply. Fulbrights are available to virtually all countries that are recognized by the United States. The criteria include a feasible, well-defined project or course of study in a specific country for which the applicant is well-prepared in terms of academic background and language proficiency. Applicants should be prepared to demonstrate familiarity with both the topic and the destination country.

For further information, contact the Honors Office. Applications are due Sept. 12.

Students face new regulations

By KRISTEN FALLAN
Staff Reporter

Changes in the policies of Residence Life, Food Services and Security will affect both resident and commuting students.

Christopher M. Janosik, director of Residence Life, said the changes in the residence hall regulations are a result of conclusions from last year's Program Evaluation Committee (PEC) evaluation and the 1980 Middle States evaluation.

Quiet hours, 8 p.m. to 8 a.m., Sunday through Thursday, will be enforced to provide the "stronger academic climate" Villanova needs, said Janosik.

The College and University Security Information Act, which requires colleges and universities in the state to report crime statistics and security procedures, influenced the heightening of campus security, said Janosik. Through these changes, Residence Life wants students to practice their own security and cooperate with the new regulations, he added.

Janosik said, "Villanova does not have a violent crime problem ... but do we wait ... or do we take preventive measures now?"

This fall's changes are phase one of the three-phase program for better campus security. Janosik said, "Phase one is educational ... an awareness approach."

As of now, several dorms have "Exit Only" doors to direct the Book buyers struggle with familiar problems

By LAURA STEVENS
Staff Reporter

Bookstore lines extended for over 25 people and 45 minutes as Villanova students tried to purchase their books for the fall semester.

"I have received surprisingly few complaints so far this year considering the size of the program," reported English department chairperson Dr. Sterling F. Delano.

"We have over 180 sections that amount to tens of thousands of books, and two official complaints isn't that bad. There may, of course, be problems that simply haven't been brought to my attention and will surface later in the week," he said.

Positive reports also came from the accounting and economics departments. Dr. Charles Zech, economics department chairperson, said, "We've had no reported problems yet. The bookstore as a whole seems to be running better since Charles Johnson [the new book manager] took charge."

Positive opinions were not, however, unanimous within the University. Dr. Donald Kelly, chairperson of the history department, complained of "serious, persistent problems with the bookstore. The books simply are not predictably on the shelves when and where they should be. The teachers are also not notified when books are out of print until the classes have started.

"This may not be solely the problem of the bookstore manager," Kelly continued. "There is the possibility that the school administration and the publishing companies share some of the responsibility," he said.

Dr. Michael E. Burke, director of the honors program, also hesitated to blame the manager for the problems. "This is the first year for the new manager, and he seems to have inherited an inefficient system."

Burke did say that teachers should be notified more quickly about out-of-print books and ordering problems.

The science department expressed the least satisfaction with the bookstore.

Dr. R. William Marks of the biology department expressed similar dissatisfaction. "Our core lab manual is not on the shelves, and there's no way we can begin our classes without it. That book has been in the store all summer and they just won't bring it upstairs."

Marks cited a particular story about several biology students who went to the bookstore and asked for their manuals. "The person behind the counter just said, 'That's not my job,' and refused to get their books for them," he said.

Lines in the bookstore were long as students attempted to purchase books for the fall semester.

John R. Bauman, floor manager of the bookstore, refused any interview or comment, saying he was too busy running the store.

"These lines will be here through 9 p.m. and my assistant and myself have to relieve the cashiers, so I can't really talk," said Bauman.

Paterno criticized for endorsement

By College Press Service

Penn State football coach Joe Paterno has come under fire for delivering a brief address at the Republican National Convention seconding Vice President George Bush's presidential nomination.

"It's wrong for an academic institution to actually involve itself in partisan politics," Penn State Student Government President Seth Williams said.

Pennsylvania Gov. Robert Casey, a Democrat, said it was "probably not a good thing for the university" for Paterno to participate in the convention.

In lobbying for funds in the legislature and among alumni, of course, the school must appeal to people of all stripes.

"I'll be damned if I'll sit still while people who can't carry George Bush's shoes ridicule him," Paterno countered. Though he had second thoughts about giving the speech, "then I said that's ridiculous because I really want to do it. I have that kind of respect for Bush."

Bush's education advisors include teachers and administrators like President James Cheek of Howard University and President Benjamin Payton of Tuskegee University.

"My feeling is that those of us in education who are concerned about schools and the future of education have to become involved," said Dr. Ed Argenbright, a Bush advisor and Montana State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

GOP presidential nominee experienced in government

By DANIEL MORIARTY
Staff Reporter

George Herbert Walker Bush, the Republican nominee for president, has spent most of the last 20 years of his life in public service, in both elected and appointed positions.

Bush was born in Milton, Mass. Bush, 64, is the second-oldest in an Episcopalian family of five children. The family moved to Greenwich, Conn., after the company for which Bush's father worked was relocated in Manhattan.

Following the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, the 18-year-old Bush enlisted in the U.S. Navy Reserve, becoming the youngest pilot in the Naval Air Service. He flew 58 combat missions over the Pacific Ocean, returning to the United States in December 1944.

Marriage to Barbara Pierce, whom he met four years earlier, came two weeks later.

Bush then earned a bachelor's degree in economics from Yale University, where he became captain of the baseball team. He also belonged to the honor society Phi Beta Kappa, Skull and Bones, and the Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity.

After graduating, George and Barbara Bush moved to Texas where "I sought a chance to learn the oil business and make money," he wrote in his autobiography, "Looking Forward." He helped to found the Bush-Overby Corp. and later became chairman and chief executive officer of Zapata Petroleum.

Bush's father served as U.S. Senator (R-Conn.) from 1952 to 1962. Bush himself became involved in Texas politics and ran for U.S. Senate in the solidly Democratic state in 1964.

He lost the election but ran for the House of Representatives in 1966. He won then and again in 1968, and became the first Republican to represent Houston in Congress.

In Washington, Bush compiled a largely conservative record with the following exceptions. He voted affirmatively for the enfranchisement of 18-year-olds, the abolition of a military draft, adoption of a Congressional Ethics Code and an open housing act.

In 1970 Bush again lost a campaign for U.S. Senate against Lloyd M. Bentsen Jr., who is now the Democratic Party vice presidential nominee.

Former President Richard Nixon then appoined him ambassador to the United Nations.

Three years later, Nixon again called upon Bush asking him to be chairman of the Republican National Committee. Bush remained in that position weathering the stormy days surrounding Nixon's resignation.

In 1974 President Gerald Ford named Bush "ambassador" to the People's Republic of China. The United States did not have formal diplomatic relations with China at that time.

Bush ran for the Republican Party presidential nomination in 1980 and lost to former California Gov. Ronald Reagan.

Reagan initially chose Ford as his running mate. But the two disagreed over the division of executive powers. Reagan then turned to Bush.

As vice president, he has chaired the National Security Council's "crisis management team" and task forces on regulatory relief, illegal immigration, crime and drug trafficking, among others.

Bush has also traveled extensively to foreign nations as vice president.

Reagan chooses Hispanic as education nominee

By College Press Service

Calling him "a distinguished educator," President Reagan nominated Texas Tech University President Lauro Cavazos to be the next secretary of education August 9, but Texas Tech students did not necessarily agree with the President's assessment of him.

"When I heard about it [Cavazos' nomination] I was surprised," said Scott Brumley, the editor of the University Daily, Texas Tech's student paper. "It appears to be more a political move than an attempt to put a competent person in that position."

Cavazos is the first Hispanic nominated to serve in the cabinet. Reagan dismissed allegations the nomination was a campaign ploy, saying he chose Cavazos because "he seemed to be the best-fitted man for the job."

"There probably is somebody else more qualified," countered Joel West, another Daily staffer who called the nomination "a political play" designed to attract Hispanic voters to the Republican party.

Many students, Brumley noted, feel "cynical" about Cavazos' nomination. Cavazos' tenure under President Reagan will last just a few months, minimizing his chance to do much policy-making.

Alicia Sandoval of the National Education Association agreed. She called the nomination a "ploy to help get Bush elected and carry Texas. A classic case of tokenism."

"We feel this particular announcement is politically motivated," Sandoval said. "Cavazos is like a substitute teacher."

The cast of characters changes in administration

By E.H. McELDOWNEY
Staff Reporter

Robert J. Martin, former assistant to the president, has left the University and is working for a Philadelphia law firm, according to Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life.

This change is only one of several in the University's administration.

His replacement is the Rev. Robert J. Welsh, O.S.A. Martin is continuing to represent Villanova in discussions and negotiations regarding west campus development.

Steve McWilliams, previously the judicial affairs officer, is now the University's international student advisor. McWilliams said he thought he "had good ideas on how to improve the international student's experience of Villanova.

Dermot Anderson is the new judicial affairs officer.

G. Thomas Bull has replaced Paul D. Walker as the director of personnel.

Nancy Doodak is the new director of the Career Development Center. She replaces Robert Stokes, who moved to the continuing education office. Doodak worked previously at Ithaca College, where she held the same position.

Jeanne M. Maguire is the new assistant program director. She is a 1986 Villanova graduate and received a master's degree in counseling psychology from Boston College. She replaces Maura Harling.

Tony Alfano, who was previously the assistant director of Connelly Center, is now the director of the center, replacing Marc E. Tuchman.

According to the University's "Blue Book," the University is still searching for a new director of Financial Aid. The previous director was Vincent Femia.

Femia died July 9 after a long illness, according to Barbara Fawler, secretary of the Personnel department.

Turn signal gets green light

Students' persistence finally pays off

By HALLIE ZIMMERMAN
Staff Reporter

On May 10 the Radnor Township Highway Department installed a left-turn signal at the intersection of Lancaster and Ithan avenues, according to Dan Malloy, director of Public Works.

The signal, which feeds from Lancaster Avenue onto Ithan Avenue in the direction of the main gate and the Jake Nevin Field House, is supposed to alleviate the safety hazards and traffic congestion surrounding the intersection.

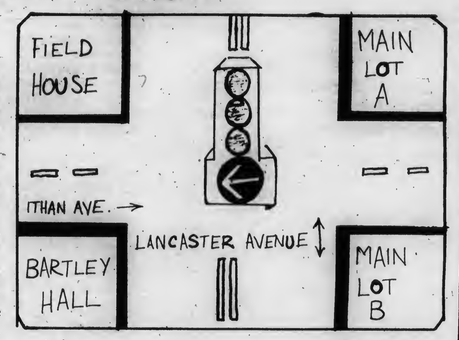
Spearheading the efforts to obtain permission for the signal were Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life and Joe Allman's Student Government administration. Last year's secretary of external affairs, Patricia Marzulli, picked up where the previous Student Government left off.

Research conducted by Student Government showed that most of the accidents at the intersection involved the turn from Lancaster Avenue onto Ithan Avenue toward south campus. The research was submitted to the Pennsylvania Department of Transportation [PennDOT], as was a student petition which the Resident Student Association [RSA] helped to circulate.

All these efforts paid off when PennDOT agreed to survey the intersection and subsequently approved a permit in March 1987.

At that time Phil Brach, currently Student Government president but then secretary of external affairs, estimated that it could take up to two years for the actual installation. In fact, 15 months passed after the permit was issued before the signal was completed.

Student reaction to the signal is mixed, however, due to the confusion about why it moves the cars going left onto Ithan Avenue toward the Jake Nevin Field House and main gate rather than toward the main parking lot.



(Graphic by Bullion)

Brach explained that the light will serve to advance the few cars that turn toward the main gate, which will enable cars going into the main parking lot to have a clear view. "Once I saw it in operation I understood how it will help both left turns on Lancaster," said Brach.

Neville, while thankful that a signal was finally obtained, said, "It seems to me there is a need for an arrow going the other way ... I don't think it's really addressing the problem we have."

Neville added, "We can go back and say 'Hey, this isn't helping us too much' ... We'll just wait and then we'll go back again."

Traffic Safety Officer Martha Gurney of the Radnor Township Police Department said that to her knowledge there have not been any accidents since the signal's installation. Gurney handles about one-quarter of the accidents in Radnor Township.

Malloy, when asked if he thought the signal would help prevent accidents, resonded that he thought it would help traffic flow, but added, "I don't think it will help the pedestrians."

At Drexel, too, a new leader

Richard D. Breslin took over as Drexel University's new president on Sept. 2 amid some controversy, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Breslin, a former Augustinian priest and dean of the University's College of Arts and Sciences, replaced William S. Gaither, who resigned last fall after allegations of sexual harassment. For the past four years, Breslin had been president of the University of Charleston in West Virginia.

The controversy Breslin faced concerned the planned closing of the day care center operated by Drexel. The university is phasing out its early childhood education program. Breslin said the space occupied by the center was needed for classrooms.

Drexel officials secured alternative care at the Crime Prevention Association. This facility agreed to accept any child attending the Drexel center at no additional cost.

B.U. to aid school system

Boston University has agreed to manage the ailing school system of Chelsea, Mass., at the request of the financially troubled city's school committee, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer. The agreement could be an unprecedented move, depending on how final details are arranged.

The university also plans to make drastic changes in the school system's curriculum. It also has proposed a "family school" model which would include children's health services, adult literacy classes and parent counseling.

Questions persist over how the university's plans will be implemented. The Chelsea school system's dropout and pregnancy rates are the highest in Massachusetts, while test scores and teacher salaries are among the lowest.

Commuters live in dorms

Freshman commuters were invited to stay in the dormitories with freshman residents during this week's orientation program at Chestnut Hill College in Philadelphia, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Officials at the private school for women decided to extend the invitation to the 22 commuters to try to make all of the 135 new students feel that they belonged to the school community.

In the past, residents and commuters have not integrated well, said Sister Genevieve Prendergast, Chestnut Hill's dean of students, to the Inquirer.

Used book market created

By MAUREEN STAPLETON
Staff Reporter

The first used book sale in recent memory sold approximately 500 books last week in Alumni Hall's gymnasium.

Kate Wagenmann, the organizer of the event, said, "We took about $8,000 in gross sales from the bookstore."

Although the sale was not run for profit, the sale still grossed approximately $150 after cost from the 50-cent fee which was collected from each student, added Wagenmann.

Wagenmann was pleased with the success of the sale, but stressed the need for more volunteers for the next sale, which will be held in the spring.

The used book sale was originally conceived by Student Government's department of Internal Affairs. Wagenmann undertook the responsibility of the sale two weeks before school was scheduled to begin.

Phil Brach, president of Student Government, said, "We were late in getting organized because there was a misunderstanding of who was in charge."

Wagenmann, with the help of Dan Kortenhaus, formed the Students Used Book Committee for the administration of this event. Other organizations which helped in the sale were the Resident Student Association, Student Government and the Society for the Advancement of Managers, said Wagenmann.

One hundred books were remaining after the sale, which either were unclaimed on Friday or without proper identification. These books were then sold to the "Book Buy-Back" which brought an additional $135 profit to the organization. The books which could not be sold may be donated to a local library.

Another sale will be held at the outset of the spring semester in January 1989, said Wagenmann and Brach.

Freshmen encounter Plato in Orientation Program

By BARBARA KRESCH
Staff Reporter

This year, for the first time in the history of the Orientation Program, faculty members met with students in academic discussion.

On Aug. 28, a half-hour before the discussions were to take place, sounds of orientation cheers and sights of students studying and talking about Socrates were scattered around the courtyard in front of Connelly Center.

Dr. John A. Doody, chairperson of the philosophy department and coordinator of the program, said that the students seemed to be taking the assignment seriously. He said he saw Cliff's Notes of Plato fall out of one student's notebook.

At the same time, the faculty leaders of the discussion talked about the text before meeting with freshmen.

Doody said, "If students from all five colleges were doing this, we wanted the faculty from all five, including nursing, business, engineering, arts and sciences."

He said that it was a good opportunity for faculty to meet each other and that there was exciting discussion among the professors.

Doody recommended the program in the middle of the last school year in order to "introduce freshmen to the academic side of Villanova University during orientation ... and to what a liberal arts education is all about."

Doody said the "Apology" was chosen because "a message from it is that an unexamined life is not worth living." The dialogue describes the philosopher Socrates' trial in ancient Greece.

Doody said he wanted to see that the students had read the material, thought about it and would discuss it enthusiastically.

In the room of orientation group 53 in Bartley Hall, the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., the new University president, asked the students questions about wisdom, education and their view of Socrates. Five out of the 25 students said that they had already studied philosophy, though most talked during the discussion.

Dobbin, in reference to the purpose of education, said, "College is more than the accumulation of knowledge, it involves the integration of what one learns into a field broader than one's own field and most importantly, to one's own life."

Dobbin said that all the students seemed to have read it and to have been well prepared and very willing to think."

Doody said that "most or all of the faculty think that it is a good idea ... though they expressed a desire for a new reading."

He said that they will have a similar discussion next year.

Many of the freshmen said the discussion was better than they thought it would be.

"It was a change of pace during orientation ... The discussion was interesting once I got into it," said freshman Rob Birdsell.

Dobbin states positions on current student issues aid, a need for expansion of physical facilities and the quality of student life.

Increase endowment

Of these problems, it appeared that Dobbin regarded low endowment as one of the most important. He said that the lack of funds is "the one thing that stands in the way" of the continued drive for excellence and later added that a major fund raising effort will be undertaken.

"The schools that we're competing with now are first-rate universities that have huge endowments for the most part, certainly endowments much larger than ours, and [it] enables them to do things that we are struggling to do," said Dobbin.

He described endowment as "essential" for student financial aid and said raising funds for that purpose will be more efficient than continually raising tuition. Increasing student aid will also help to create a more diverse student body, he said.

Driscoll said in February that the University needs approximately $300 million in order to complete its master plan of development and expansion. Dobbin also noted the need for construction funds.

Increased endowment also would pay the salaries of guest professors and established chairs in various subjects, said Dobbin.

Dobbin said that as president he will be working closely with the "strategic planning" process which began last semester with the PEC report.

Space problems

The University's physical facilities "have not grown nearly in proportion to the growth of the student body," said Dobbin. "As a result, we are in dire need of office space for faculty and for staff, classroom space ... dormitory space," he added.

"We've got to house a much larger percentage of our resident students," added Dobbin. He also said that the quality of housing must improve and suggested creating "apartment dormitories" which would not have a "barracks atmosphere."

Dobbin said that being able to house more students will help in recruiting students nationally.

Financial aid

Increased financial aid will also be a factor in diversifying the student body, "culturally, geographically and economically," said Dobbin.

Dobbin said he supports the PEC goal of raising the University budget for financial aid grants "but the way of doing it is the question."

He added that there will have to be a tuition increase to pay for increased student aid because "we're not about to have this endowment income in here that quickly." He also said there may be ways to save money in other areas of the University in order to increase student aid funds.

Dobbin described the financial aid problem as "really urgent ... it is hurting us with our competition."

Dobbin described the financial problem as "really urgent. . . it is hurting us with our competition."

Quality of student life

Dobbin said the caliber of Villanova students has been steadily increasing over recent years and pointed to higher Scholastic Aptitude Test scores and class ranks as evidence. He added that this was a major factor for the University's currently high-ranking position.

He later said that improving the campus' academic atmosphere "is essential [if] Villanova is going to take its place among the elite." Students, faculty and staff have all agreed with this need for improvement, he said.

Echoing the recommendations of PEC outside evaluator Dr. Arthur Shriberg, Dobbin said integrating the academic part of the University with residence life and student life is a way to reach this goal.

Dobbin said a PEC-recommended task force will be formed this month to investigate this issue.

Dobbin underscored his opinion later in the interview when he said he would not follow through on the PEC's recommendation to terminate the Center for Peace and Justice.

He said he considered the center "extremely important" and added, "if anything, I'd be prone to increase resources" toward it. Describing it as an example of how to integrate academics into student life, he said, "as far as the space [for the center in Sullivan Hall's basement] is concerned, if that space is used by students for intelligent conversation, it's some of the best-used space we have around here ... I think in general when you have that kind of thing it's good."

An opening for coed dorms

Dobbin left open the possibility of creating coeducational dormitories without committing himself to their installation.

"In principle, I have no problem with them ... but I'm a firm believer in process," he said. If students want coed dorms, they should take their case through the political process of the University Senate, rather than directly to him, he said.

Dobbin said it would be better if the proposal "would be hammered out, the pros and cons of it would be discussed with various consituencies — faculty, administration ... alumni, they would have some input to it."

He speculated that the result of a Senate decision on coed dorms "would be some sort of a go-ahead on coed dormitories ... in a context that it would not be at all unfavorable to our alumni and to parents ... whatever the problems people might have with them, well, they'd be answered."

He concluded by remaining noncommittal. "I myself am not a strong advocate, nor am I in any way opposed ... I'd like to see the proposal as it's hammered out," he said.

"I myself am not a strong advocate, nor am I in any way opposed [to coed dorms]. . I'd like to see the proposal as it's hammered out."

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president

Academic issues

Another main reason for the University's recent success is "the gradual development of the faculty," said Dobbin. The University has been trying to select faculty who are interested in both research and "excellence in teaching," he added.

On a related issue, Dobbin sided "with the substance" of the faculty affairs committee's argument in the debate over the importance of research, scholarship and graduate education.

The debate began last spring, when the PEC said in its final report that a correct, strict interpretation of the Mission Statement shows that research, scholarship and graduate education are secondary to undergraduate education. The faculty committee responded by arguing that since the Mission Statement was promulgated in 1979, the concepts concerning the issue in the Mission Statement have not been implemented by the University community. Dobbin was a member of the PEC.

But Dobbin does not defend his view with the faculty's "community consensus" argument. Instead, his reading of the Mission Statement invokes the tradition of St. Augustine and his followers.

"I think if you understand the Augustinian character that is behind the Mission Statement, you couldn't make that misinterpretation that is called the strict interpretation. The Augustinian tradition so strongly encourages research and ongoing scholarship ... for Augustine, the pursuit of wisdom is open-ended, so it's not limited to undergraduate study because undergraduate study by its nature is a beginning," said Dobbin.

Dobbin added that the priorities of research and teaching cut across the boundaries of undergraduate and graduate education. He said, for instance, that undergraduate professors should be held to the same standards of research as graduate professors.

He said that good graduate programs, in the context of the University's emphasis on undergraduate education, will "bolster the undergraduate program."

Strategic planning

Dobbin said that as president he will be working closely with the "strategic planning" process which began last semester with the PEC report.

The PEC's strategic planning involved estimating the impact of "major external forces" on the University, as well as the University's internal strengths and weaknesses and the personal values of the University in the context of the Mission Statement.

Dobbin said his work will include integrating academic planning with virtually every aspect of the University.

Dobbin commended the process, saying, "Nowadays you've got to be very careful about where you're going. You can't just be everything." He added that the University has to define what it wants to be "and go after it."

University governance

Dobbin said he regards the University Senate as "the primary instrument of governance, which it is, it's what it's described as."

He also said he would like to meet with student leaders on an ongoing basis.

Athletics

"I am extremely sympathetic toward athletics," said Dobbin. "I think it is important to the life of the school, I think it integrates the students and the alumni and tends to foster interest, even though other things can, too."

In regards to the football program, Dobbin said it should be monitored with the principles set by a University committee at the time of the restoration of the program in mind. One of those principles was financial affordability, said Dobbin.

He added that part of the program's costs are initial and temporary.

Dobbin also said he is not against the football program.

search task force.

In accordance with the University's bylaws, the names of recommended candidates were given to the Rev. Joseph Duffey, O.S.A., religious superior of the Augustinian Province of St. Thomas of Villanova [eastern United States] for submission to the 23-member board. Duffey is an ex-officio member of the governing body.

All presidential candidates were Augustinian priests from the eastern province. Devine said recently that the names of the other candidates could not be released.

Dobbin, a theologian, is a native of Brooklyn, N.Y., and a 1958 graduate of Villanova. He was ordained to the priesthood in 1962.

He has a master's degree in both theology and mathematics and holds a doctorate in sacred theology from the University of Louvain, Belgium.

The other candidates and the actual vote count were not revealed.

Following his ordination, Dobbin was a faculty member at nearby Malvern Preparatory School, where he taught both religion and mathematics and served as dean of students.

In 1971 he was assigned to the Washington Theological Union, a Roman Catholic school for ministry as a professor of theology. He remained there, serving in a number of capacities, until his appointment as associate vice president for Academic Affairs at Villanova in July 1987.

Dobbin was a member of the University's Board of Trustees for nine years and is currently chairperson of the Board of Trustees of Merrimack College in North Andover, Mass.

He is a prolific writer in the area of theology and Catholic thought, and is a recognized scholar and administrator.

Student election

"Any flagrant violation of election laws will result in the removal of the candidate from the ballot," according to the new commission rules.

The three candidates are scheduled to debate Monday at 7:30 p.m. in the Villanova Room of the Connelly Center, according to Rizzo. After the debate, the candidates will be given the special rules for election day campaigning, said Rizzo.

The election will be held on Sept. 20. The Election Commission decided that freshmen will not vote in this election due to the special circumstances.

The Elections Commission statement released in April 1988 recommended that "... the presidential election held on April 12th be declared null and void, and that a new election be held in the fall of 1988." Controversy caused by a Villanovan editorial about the election and consequent disposal and misuse of the editorial by presidential candidates Terise Fusco and Sean Closkey, respectively, led to the nullification of the election results. Last year's Student Government president, Phil Brach, has remained president since that time.

Ciarrocca is a senior education major with a business minor and a concentration in mathematics. He is presently a goalie for the lacrosse team. Ciarrocca served as an orientation counselor during Orientation 1988. He is also a member of Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity and served as pledge educator in the spring of 1987 and fundraising chairperson in spring of 1987 for his fraternity. Ciarrocca is a member of the graduate education honor society.

Closkey served as assistant secretary of the internal affairs department for Student Government and as chairperson of the student life committee of the University Senate. He also founded the Student Activities on Campus Committee [SACC] during his freshman year. Closkey is a member of Sigma Pi fraternity.

Candidate Lewis is a senior business administration major with a concentration in marketing and a minor in political science and honors. He served as a University senator in 1987-88. He served on the University Senate budget committee and the University Senate planning and priorities committee in 1987-88 and was a leader of the budget increase protest last spring. Lewis served as the assistant secretary of budgetary affairs under 1986-87 Student Government President Joe Allman.

Modern sculpture repair continues

By THOMAS BRUGGER
Staff Reporter

Reconstruction of the modern sculpture "Awakening" should be completed before the end of the fall semester, according to Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life.

The work, located outside Connelly Center, was vandalized on March 26 following Villanova's loss to Oklahoma in the 1988 NCAA basketball tournament. A three-ton slab of sculpted marble was pried from its foundation.

Witnesses reported seeing some unidentified people "hanging around" the statue prior to the incident.

Villanova commissioned Jay Dugan, sculptor and donator of "Awakening," with the resulting insurance payment to repair the sculpture. He traveled on May 1 to Tivoli, Italy, in search of a slab of marble with matching texture and age for the restoration.

Dugan has said of his work, "What you try to do in an abstract sculpture is relate your ideas to the geometric shapes and allow them to represent your feelings." Dugan explained, "My purpose in creating it was to give a new dimension to the lives of you Villanova students."

Though Dugan was currently unavailable for comment, Neville explained that the artist had returned and work on the sculpture was progressing well. He also predicted the completion may be done as early as Nov. 1.

Neville added that, to the dismay of the University, not enough information was ever uncovered to corroborate the guilt of any parties in the act of vandalism.

Villanova host of festival

By G.J. DONNELLY
Staff Reporter

The Philadelphia Ceili Group [PCG] will hold its 14th Annual Traditional Irish Music and Dance Festival tomorrow at Villanova University.

The festival, the oldest of its kind in the United States, will run from 12 p.m. to midnight. It will gather together Irish musicians from both Ireland and the United States to celebrate traditional Irish music and dance.

Scheduled to perform are Ireland's acclaimed fiddler Sean McGuire, piper/flutist Tim Britton and world champion Irish step dancer Liam Harney. Also performing will be Donna Long, an accomplished pianist and fiddler; Brendan Mulvihill, one of the finest Irish fiddlers in the United States; step dancer Dierdre Goulding; fiddlers Andy McGann and Paddy Reynolds and singers Edmund Lenihan, Paddy Berry and Frank Harte.

The Philadelphia area will be represented by such well-known musicians as singer/instrumentalist Mick Moloney, fiddlers Eugene O'Donnell and John Kelly, accordion player Kevin McGillian and the Egan family.

This is the first year the festival has been held at Villanova. Previous festivals have been held at Fischer's Pool in Lansdale, Pa.

"Villanova is an excellent location," explained Bill Stein, press contact for the PCG. "Everyone knows where it is and its is within range of transportation."

Stein is optimistic about attracting a large audience.

"You don't have to be Irish to appreciate it," he said. "The music is an ongoing tradition. We want to expose it to a new generation to keep it going on," he added.

In addition to music and dance, there will be crafts and exhibits. Food and beverages will also be available. No alcohol will be sold.

Both daytime and night tickets will be sold, as well as "all-festival" tickets. Discounts are available for advance purchasers, senior citizens and children under 16.

For tickets and information call the Philadelphia Ceili Group at 849-8879 or contact Dr. James Murphy at the English Department, Room 301 Vasey Hall.

Wrestling program ended comment, but he said to the Philadelphia Inquirer Aug. 6, "I don't know what caused the change of attitude of the University. Last May, they gave me permission to tell recruits that we were going to have a wrestling room.

"I feel terrible for the wrestlers, who will have a difficult time finding other programs that have scholarship money available at this time," he said.

According to Aceto, there are eight wrestlers who have received at least partial scholarships. He said that all of them are still at the University but added that some may leave in order to find other schools with wrestling programs. He also said that the University will honor all scholarship commitments for those wrestlers who choose to remain at Villanova.

"We will go out of our way to make sure that they are taken care of. If they need to remain at the school or try to transfer ... we will certainly help them," Aceto said.

Lyndon Campbell, one of the wrestlers on scholarship, said, "I can't believe they dropped the program on us. They're just hurting the athletes. We're going to school and we want to wrestle. Those are our main dreams."

Campbell said he is uncertain about his future plans. "I know I'm going to finish out this year and I'll probably end up transferring somewhere else where they have a wrestling program. I have some dreams to accomplish and they're not going to be done sitting around here," he said.

"If we want to have a well-rounded sports program, we should never decide to drop a program," said Phil Brach, Student Government president.

Brach said that the level of competition should be examined. If the University cannot afford to maintain an athletic program at the Division I level, then it should be reduced to a Division II or III status, or kept as an intramural or club sport, he said.

The Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., former University president, announced in August the elimination of the University's wrestling program, headed by John duPont.

Pre-game festivities over to the director of Athletics for promotions and marketing, said in an interview Sept. 2, "We won't know until tomorrow [the day of the first game] if there's an effect" on the football program.

McDonough said Tuesday that 1,800 student tickets were sold the day of the game last Saturday. According to McDonough, past student ticket sales the day of the game usually numbered between 200 and 300.

Robert J. Capone, director of Alumni, said pre-game tailgating will continue for alumni in parking lots surrounding the duPont Pavilion and Bartley parking lot.

Capone said one must have season tickets and a tailgating pass in order to park a car in one of these lots prior to the game. Alumni may also park in the main parking lot and walk over to the tailgating area, according to Capone.

Concerning the continuance of alumni tailgating, Neville said, "The only thing we [the University] have to stop is underage drinking. Alumni are certainly of age."

Neville said, "We hope not to have that problem" of students entering the area for alumni tailgating.

Capone said a mailing had been sent to alumni encouraging them not to allow students to tailgate with them unless they are family.

Holding student pre-game tailgates outside, where alcohol would not be allowed, was not a feasible solution, according to Neville. He said, "We don't have the facilities ... to police that."

McDonough spoke of proposing the possibility of leasing a building such as the duPont Pavilion, Butler Annex or Jake Nevin Fieldhouse to an outside restaurant which could hold a pregame reception on game days. Although no formal proposal has been made yet, McDonough used Chili's restaurant in Wayne as an example.

McDonough said, "We [the Athletics department] don't want to be running the party" but do want to provide a place for students 21 and over to socialize before the game.

Neville considered an event held indoors which served alcohol to be more manageable than one held outdoors and added that the restaurant leasing the building would be responsible for checking for identification at the door.

Neville said Student Life would "keep pushing and supplying opportunities" where alcohol is not present.

He said referring to tailgates, "Social needs have to be met in some other way than in that mass way of meeting people."

He added that he is open to any suggestions of alternative activities for students.

Gary H. Bonas, assistant director of Student Activities, said the nearly $27,000 budgeted for tailgates will be used in "trying to get a good number of concerts with quality acts."

The money spent on tailgates covered renting tables and tents, set-up and cleanup by maintenance and the training and payment of the now-defunct Tailgate Management Team, according to Bonas.

Bonas said the additional money from the tailgates was a "pretty big cushion" towards the concerts.

Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities, hopes to have two major concerts each semester with well-known performers who can compete with performers at the Spectrum.

Seniors John Price, chairperson of the Tailgate Management Team, and Luci Jankowski, vice-chairperson, both expressed regret about the end of student tailgating but added that they understood why it had to be stopped.

Tuition rise

Room and board costs vary according to where the student resides. The highest rate is $4,720 while the lowest is $4,120, said a member of Residence Life.

She also added that students have no option in regards to the meal plan, for they must receive it if they are to live on campus.

The cost of the meal plan for commuting students is $1,215 a semester, according to Residence Life.

Finally, students are also expected to pay a registration fee of $75 every semester.

In all, nationwide the average student will pay 7 percent more for tuition and fees this academic year, the College Board found in its annual tuition report released in mid-August. Inflation, as measured by consumer prices, was 4 percent since fall 1987.

Whatever the trend, it has not kept students out of class. While official numbers are not out yet, many campuses received record numbers of applications for fall term, indicating that Americans are willing to pay more for college.

"People want to get a college degree and will pay whatever it takes to get it," said Carnes, who believes colleges are charging more because they know their consumers can simply turn around and borrow more from the federal government. "Under those circumstances, there are no constraints [on price]."

University of Rochester researchers, for example, determined that lowering tuition does not necessarily draw more students to campus.

Miss. black fraternity house possible victim of arson

By College Press Service

A building that was to have housed the first black fraternity on the University of Mississippi's "fraternity row" burned down Aug. 4, an eerie parallel to the way 1987-88's nationwide epidemic of campus racial tensions began.

In August 1987, police at Mississippi State University refused to arrest three white students who threw a black classmate into a pool, where he drowned. The incident was the first of a series of beatings, sit-ins, fights and confrontation on campuses from Massachusetts to California through the 1987-88 school year.

At Ole Miss, all-black Phi Beta Sigma's move onto the previously all-white fraternity row was intended as a symbol of racial progress.

"This is a setback to our plans to move a black fraternity to fraternity row," spokesman Dr. Edwin Meek said.

The fire, which investigators strongly suspect was started by an arsonist, "surprised me and my fraternity brothers," member Lloyd Dixon said. "It makes me feel bad that someone would do this," he added.

The 50-year-old building, which Phi Beta Sigma was renovating before the fire, was vacant, and no one was hurt during the blaze.

Worried about the fire's symbolism, however, other students, alumni and Ole Miss officials stampeded to help the fraternity. On August 9, Chancellor Gerald Turner offered to renovate another frat row house for the chapter.

"This is a good opportunity to take advantage of an ugly situation," said Associate Dean Sparky Reardon, the Interfraternity Council [IFC] advisor.

"I've gotten dozens of calls from people asking 'who do I write a check to?' " added IFC President Stuart Brunson. "This event actually seems to have brought people closer together."

Dixon said his fraternity was enthusiastic about the idea because it would put the black Greeks into "the mainstream of the campus."

With black students in the mainstream, the university hoped to show it had come a long way since 1962. "They're trying to change the image of the South," said Cheryl Burton, a Black Student Union officer and a Phi Beta Sigma "sweetheart."

In fact, the fraternity's move was so important to Mississippi that even Gov. Ray Mabus has gotten into the act. "We are not going to let stuff like this slow us down," Mabus said of the fire.

"We thought that kind of thing was dead and gone," Meek said. "Everything was proceeding without a hitch ... and this happens," he continued.

Campus changes

Parking lots were constructed next to Stanford Hall in order to accommodate the need for extra space brought about by the construction of two new dormitories on south campus.

New rules created flow of traffic to a central location. Fines are being imposed for offenses, such as $100 penalty for propping open doors.

Phase two includes electronic locking devices and security personnel located in each hall, while phase three places a manned desk in the main entrance of each hall.

Food Services

J. Les Gies, director of Food Services, said a change in policy, banning the removal of items from the dining halls, occurred after Food Services considered the amount of wasted food and food given to non-resident students.

The fact that non-residents were eating from the dining halls "was a burden on the students who were paying," said Gies.

"This new policy should lead to less than normal increase in cost," said Gies.

Parking Stickers

Commuters, as well as others with parking stickers, are also faced with a new regulation. "If you report your hang tag lost or stolen, you will have to buy another one," states an update on 1988 parking regulations.

Chief Rowan P. Kelly, director of Security, said, "It is my responsibility to secure spaces for those who are entitled to have them."

Repurchasing lost or stolen hang tags is one way through which Kelly plans to decrease any parking problems.

Board retains most of threatened programs

grams reviewed and judged by competent faculty," said Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice president for Academic Affairs.

The PEC issued an approximately 340-page report last spring, the culmination of two years of study and analysis of the University. Driscoll charged the committee to evaluate all academic and non-academic programs to "arrive at resource allocation recommendations on a program-by-program basis," according to a PEC newsletter.

The APC met four times in June, said Driscoll. "The purpose of these meetings was to discuss thoroughly" issues raised by the PEC report and "to hear the relevant points of view from the departments and academic deans" regarding the programs recommended by the PEC for termination, he added.

Responses submitted by members of the University community were read and "several departments, being closer to more current information and the latest data, made very compelling cases for their programs," said Driscoll.

Terminated programs

The PEC recommended that the bachelor of arts in theatre be given a fall 1990 deadline to reach an enrollment level of 16 majors. But "during discussions ... questions arose regarding the appropriateness of the theatre major for undergraduate students. Current debate within the field tends to regard the professional training aspects of the discipline as more suitable for graduate students," said Driscoll in the letter.

Driscoll added there was "serious doubt" that the small number of theatre majors warranted the program's continuation.

Poor facilities, the high cost of building campus art studios and very low enrollment were factors in the decision to terminate the bachelor of fine arts program. In its place, a two-year major in art and art history will be developed, said Driscoll.

Driscoll said the termination of these programs "does not lessen the importance of the fine arts in the undergraduate curriculum."

He added that the College of Arts and Sciences is considering requiring theatre and art history courses as core requirements.

The PEC's recommendation to terminate the master of arts in the teaching of English was agreed with by the English department and the Graduate School dean, said Driscoll. "Its termination should serve to strengthen further the current master of arts in English" and allow the department's faculty to focus on that program, he added.

Driscoll said of the master of secondary school science program, "When initiated, this program had a substantially larger clientele, along with federal subsidies, that it simply no longer has." He added that the University "can no longer abide" a graduate program that contains undergraduate courses. Alternatives to the program are being considered, said Driscoll.

In the modern languages department, the degree and designation of bachelor of arts in modern languages was dropped. But concentrations in French, Spanish and German were designated as majors.

In the graduate program, the board decided to only offer a master of arts in Spanish language and literature. "This restructuring permits the department to concentrate its energies at the graduate level more efficiently, to take advantage" of current department strengths, "to target its recruitment efforts more effectively and to serve an existing community need," said Driscoll.

Those students currently majoring in these subjects will be able to earn their degrees, said a member of University College Dean Dr. Angelo Armenti's office. No students will be allowed to join the programs.

Programs retained

Driscoll and the APC advised the board to retain the other threatened programs for a variety of reasons. The administration disagreed with the PEC recommendation to discontinue the master of science in nursing program and the APC commended the program, said Driscoll.

Similarly, the APC recommended keeping the graduate program in biology because more recent data and information from the department's response to the PEC report showed the program to be "of high quality."

Driscoll and the APC said the master of arts in theatre program should be retained partly because "the very existence of this graduate program is inextricably interrelated to the reputation for excellence that our theatre productions have historicaly enjoyed," said Driscoll.

The board gave all of the retained programs a three-year period to "demonstrate needed improvement in selected areas," said Driscoll. Members of the programs will work with their deans to identify "potential areas of improvement" and to develop and implement "a realistic plan with definable goals and objectives." This process has already begun, said Driscoll.

Decisions on two programs, master of science in library science and doctor of philosophy in chemistry, were delayed pending additional financial information.

Cherry suggested two possible motives for the APC's decision to retain so many of the threatened programs.

The first possible motive was that the APC found that some of the data used in the recommendations were flawed or incomplete, he said.

The second possible motive, said Cherry, was that the APC interpreted the University's Mission Statement, a description of the University's guiding principles promulgated in 1979, in a way that differed from the PEC interpretation.

In its final report, the PEC said that if the University is to follow its Mission Statement correctly, it must give undergraduate education a higher priority than research, scholarship and graduate education.

A statement made in a recent interview by new University President the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., a member of the PEC and APC, suggests that the second possible motive may have been a factor in the making of the recommendations.

In the interview, Dobbin argued that if one considers the Augustinian tradition embedded in the Mission Statement, then one should not make undergraduate education a higher priority than research, scholarship and graduate education.

Reconsider sexual policy

Villanova seems to have some mixed values. A violation of the new University policy on "overt sexual behavior" and/or overnight visitation carries a much stronger punishment than a violation of the sexual harassment policy.

In this year's Blue Book, Villanova forbids overt sexual behavior and/or overnight visitation between two members of the opposite sex. The policy states that such behavior will result in disciplinary probation and revocation of campus residency of all parties involved. Yet, a violation of the University's policy on sexual harassment will only most likely result in suspension.

We do not question the Catholic Church's stand and teachings on pre-marital sex. Yet, we are disappointed the University has unquestionably forced its values on all members of its community, Catholics and non-Catholics alike.

Moreover, Villanova adopted this new policy without University Senate discussion or student input.

Rather than inflicting harsh punishments for violations of the new policy, the University should concentrate on education, guidance and leading by example to achieve the goal of no overt sexual relations on campus. The University, as a Catholic institution, has the obligation to guide its students toward the proper decisions. It should not be the parental decision maker.

The University has seriously failed in its attempt to construct a sexual harassment policy. Villanova should adopt a detailed policy which contains strong ramifications for its offenders. Sexual harassment should not be taken lightly. It is a crime. It is a violation of another's person and should be punished accordingly.

Villanova should realize and attempt to correct these inconsistencies contained within the Blue Book. The new "overt sexual behavior" policy should be a part of University Senate debate.

The punishment for sexual harassment should be much more stringent than the punishment for private sexual relations between two consenting adults.

Clean up Villanova

Villanova has worn many faces throughout the years. Most recently we have worn the smiling face of one of the highest academic institutions in the east. Unfortunately, our current face is one of sadness for our campus grounds have been littered and not maintained by students and Maintenence alike. We must restore our pride and immediately start a "clean up and keep clean" Villanova campaign.

As we look around our campus we see trash strewn across the grounds. Paper cups and soda cans adorn the Awakening statue and empty beer cans can be found in almost every shrub.

The entire Villanova community must make an effort to pick up and stop littering our once beautiful campus. It is a sad day when our first impression to visitors is marred by misplaced paper products and aluminum cans. Take pride in Villanova. If we don't, no one else will.

Make it easier on yourselves and give up NOW!

Improve the Radnor House

To the Editor:

We are Villanova University seniors currently residing at Radnor House, the condominium that claims to be "city close, country quiet." The cost of renting these condominiums is almost $10,000 which is required in advance from students. The proximity to campus is ideal and enticed us into living there. We looked forward to experiencing the independence of off-campus living with the comfort of being close to school and friends. Radnor House seemed like the perfect place to be.

In anticipation of starting school and seeing old friends, we returned to Radnor House a week early to find several inconveniences with living in the building, inconveniences which have escalated into major problems. For the past two weeks, our water has not only been cold, but recently rusty. Despite numerous discussions with management, we have not seen any improvement. In addition, after the summer holiday, we returned to find a home appliance missing from our unit.

Particularly disturbing is the parking situation. Since the addition of doctor's offices has claimed approximately 50 parking spaces, finding a place to park after 7 p.m. is virtually impossible. We are afraid to take our cars out at night for fear of losing our parking spaces, receiving tickets and having our cars towed. Perhaps, as a viable solution, Radnor House should consider eliminating some of the landscape and increasing the number of parking spaces.

Additionally, the increase in the number of students in Radnor House has amplified the noise and vandalism problems. There has been an increase in the number of noise violations and fines issued. Residents must realize that their inconsiderate actions affect their neighbors as well.

Radnor House is not a dorm. There are no resident assistants to monitor juvenile activities, for example littering the hallways and elevators, roaming the building in various stages of inebriation and pulling fire alarms.

As students, we feel discriminated against because of our status. We are suffering because reputations of past students have preceded us.

These problems can not be solved by procrastination or idleness. We would appreciate any efforts on the behalf of Radnor House and its residents to make our last year at Villanova free from anxiety, and to make Radnor House the place it was meant to be.

V.U. policies on visitation, sex hypocritical

By Philip Brach

Sex is now officially against University regulations, or is it, or has it always been? It is hard to tell, but the latest attempt at clearing the issue up has confused things even more.

I am referring to pages 32—34 of the 1988—89 Blue Book and its new section on visitation which reads: "Moreover, Villanova University believes that a genuine and complete expression of love through sex requires a commitment to living and sharing of two persons in marriage. Consequently, overt sexual behavior and/or overnight visitation by a member of the opposite sex in residence halls represent flagrant violations of the Visitation Policy and the Code of Student Conduct. Such behavior will result in disciplinary probation and revocation of campus residency of all parties involved."

I admire and encourage Residence Life's attempt to justify its rules and regulations based on the Mission Statement, but there is glaring hypocrisy and unclear language regarding visitation.

First, what is "overt sexual behavior"? Does it imply that sex is all right if hidden behind closed doors? Is sex forbidden only after visitation? If you stay overnight, but do not have sex, is it a less "flagrant" violation? Who does "all parties involved" include?

More importantly, the University needs to clear up its position on homosexual and lesbian sex. The University states that sex requires a commitment of "two persons" in marriage, does this include two males or two females? Apparently it does, considering the University only punishes "overt sexual behavior" when it occurs with "a member of the opposite sex."

Hidden behind the facade of single sex dorms and visitation policies, there are girls getting pregnant in Villanova dorms and being left scared and alone.

All of these problems are rooted in the hypocrisy of the visitation policy, best stated by Residence Life itself in the first two sentences under the visitation policy (page 32 Blue Book): "Coeducation allows men and women to contribute to one another's education and to form genuine friendships. It is for these reasons that limited visitation hours have been established in University residence halls."

Whoever heard of a "genuine friendship" that is restricted by time! The very definition of a "genuine friendship" is based on being able to count on, talk to or visit any time of the day or night.

Furthermore does Residence Life truly believe the best way to form "genuine friendships" between two groups of people is to lock them up in separate buildings?

I firmly believe that the University has the right, in fact the obligation to promote and to instill the official teaching of the Catholic Church. In doing so the University must be very clear and it must occur not only on paper but in action.

Regarding sexual issues and the Catholic teaching, Residence Life and the University as a whole have drastically failed.

Hidden behind the facade of single sex dorms and visitation policies, there are girls getting pregnant in Villanova dorms and being left scared and alone. In addition, acquaintance rapes are occurring all too frequently.

I would be willing to assert that most members of the Student Life staff are closet supporters of coed dorms.

Student Government has researched the issue thoroughly; the University Senate has made a trivial recommendation regarding coed dorms. It is time for Student Life to step forward and lead the fight for coed dorms.

On behalf of the entire student body, I challenge Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students and Christopher M. Janosik, director of Residence Life, to answer the questions above, break down the walls of hypocrisy and lead the fight for coed dorms.

Philip Brach is Student Government President.

Cater to students' needs

By MAUREEN STAPLETON

Everyone is back for another exciting year at Villanova University. We have here nice people, a good basketball team and some great professors.

However, once one gets past the initial euphoria of Villanova, some warts of this place start to pop up. Some of these warts include an incredible shortage of housing, a poorly managed bookstore and food service that leaves much to be desired.

I will be the first to admit it would be silly to expect the cooking to be as good as mom's or even dad's from the cafeterias. However, the food in the cafeteria is a basic necessity to all of us who are resident students. This food becomes even more important when all available funds are depleted for pizza deliveries.

Last year, the department of Internal Affairs of Student Government initiated a food services committee in order to obtain some student input in how food services ran things. This committee was to work with J. Les Gies, the dirctor of food services to address their concerns and complaints. What has this committee accomplished?

The policy remains that each resident student is required to buy a 20 meal ticket — regardless of whether that student will eat that many meals.

Three years ago when I went on a campus tour, my guide explained to the group that this policy would soon be changed. Why does that policy remain intact when it is apparent that most students would employ the option of a different meal ticket if given the chance?

However, the required meal plan is an old issue, at best. This year, Food Services implemented a new and exciting idea to those of us who reside on campus. This year students are prohibited from carrying any food items out of the cafeteria, when last year two items could be taken from the dining halls. The best quality of the cafeterias was the fact that if a student did not have enough time to eat a sit down meal, he or she could at least grab something to eat on the way to class. Why was this policy changed and most importantly, why was it changed mysteriously over the summer?

Students at Villanova are in quite a bind when it comes to the food service that they receive here. First, students do not have a choice concerning the type of meal plan that would best suit their needs. Secondly, students are prohibited from taking anything from the dining halls, even though they have paid more than their share to Food Services.

Villanovans capitalize on Washington

By IRENE V. LANGRAN
Staff Reporter

Washington, D.C. — For years this city has attracted countless people with the action and promise that takes place within its perimeters. For three weeks in the beginning of this summer, 14 Villanova students and myself were able to become first-hand witnesses to the machinery that moves this city and this nation.

We were taking part in the Washington Minimester XVI. This year the program was again run under the leadership of Dr. Jeffrey Hahn, a Villanova political science professor.

While this program is certainly one of the most interesting ways to earn three credits, it is also one of the most intense.

Around 8 a.m. each weekday morning we found ourselves on the Washington metro, headed for a series of seminars with various people involved in the daily business of running the country.

We attended about three of these seminars each day, and soon learned how to find our way around Capitol Hill and the lobbies in the valley. In the course of our studies we met with members of Congress, lobbyists, executive branch officials, reporters and diplomats.

In Washington we were able to discover how our government truly works. While many issues and contrasting opinions were discussed, we also focused on the processes that lead to decisions. We gained first-hand knowledge of the federal government and the factors that affect the actions it takes.

The topics we studied included political parties, all three branches of government and their intricate workings, foreign policy, the black vote and women on Capitol Hill. Our studies were also highlighted by a visit to the Lebanese Embassy.

Like the many people we met in Washington, our group represented a wide range of interests. What added to the group's diversity was that this program is not limited to political science majors.

Most of the group stayed at American University for the three weeks, while others lived in the area or stayed with friends. As in years past, this program was not only a source of invaluable educational interest, but it also produced some lasting friendships and memories.

From picnics by the Tidal Basin and walks through Georgetown, to outdoor concerts by the Capitol, together we explored Washington.

Villanova students do justice to the U.S. Supreme Court building by posing on its steps earlier this summer.

We traveled not only to its museums and tourist attractions, but also its wide array of restaurants. Some of the dining we sampled was Japanese sushi, Lebanese food, French cuisine and, of course, lots of pizza.

By the end of the course, we all left knowing what we would have never been able to learn in the classroom, and with some new friends.

Just one final note: each year the Minimester group plays a softball game on Memorial Day. To add some Washington flavor, this year the Dukakis supporters were pitted against the Bush supporters. The outcome — Dukakis won by a landslide.

Learning lab leads the way to improvement

By JACQUELINE GENTILE
Assistant Features Editor

With the beginning of the school year comes the age-old vows students make: This year I will raise my G.P.A. I will never be behind in my reading. I will not procrastinate. The list goes on.

If these statements describe you, the recent addition of a learning skills laboratory to the University Counseling Center might be a good place to begin.

The laboratory is run under the supervision of Dr. Edward J. Reilly, reading and study skills counselor. Reilly explained that he opened the lab because, while there are several psychologists in the counseling center who do personal counseling, he is the only counselor who deals with learning skills.

The lab enables him to extend his reach in helping students. Additionally, he wanted to build up a study skills center because most other universities have this type of facility.

He added, "The surprise to me was that Villanova didn't have any of these support services, and although Villanova has a selective population, in any population this big there are going to be people with needs."

Which type of services does the learning skills laboratory provide? Without exaggerating, it offers something for nearly everybody. For students planning to enter graduate school there is a Graduate Record Exam (GRE) and Graduate Management Achievement Test (GMAT) preparation course that is accompanied by a book and a computer program that asks the student questions, gives feedback and totals scores. Computer instruction is also available for study skills, such as improving memory; taking lecture notes, reading text books and improving concentration.

The lab also has extensive facilities for reading improvement. Students can take tests that evaluate their reading and allow them to see how they compare to other college students in comprehension, reading speed and other areas.

Moreover, the lab has an electronically controlled reader for rate improvement that projects a story on a screen at a set rate. Afterwards, you can test yourself. When you get a certain percentage of answers correct, you set the speed setting a notch higher.

Reilly added, "Students can come in, and I can diagnose their reading and then write a program for them so they can come in and work on their own. I can monitor their progress."

The laboratory also has an audio-visual program for vocabulary improvement where a vocabulary word used in a sentence is played on a cassette while a screen shows a cartoon picture that illustrates the word's meaning.

The lab has two programs of 500 words each. One uses difficult words that Reilly stated would be appropriate for preparing for the GRE, while the other series features an easier level of vocabulary words.

Reilly recommends this program over using vocabulary improvement books. He explained that with books, "The problem is, if they have difficult words you may not be sure how to pronounce or use them."

Although most programs in the lab are geared to enhance the learning process and are not content-oriented, the center does have a computerized anatomy and physiology course that follows the text used at Villanova and enables students to test themselves.

Reilly added, "we're going to see a lot of software from book publishers . . . We would like to service a site in the future if departments have software and they want to put some where students can use it."

Reilly also explained that last year three writing assistants, who were graduate assistants in the English department, spent a total of about 20 hours a week in the lab. There they helped students get started with writing papers and offered them feedback. Reilly stated that the students were very pleased with the help they received and he plans to run the same program this year.

In addition to study skills aids, the lab offers a series of self-help tapes. Students have the choice of listening to the tapes in the lab or making their own copies. The tapes include such topics as decision making, exercise motivation, managing stress, overcoming procrastination, restful sleep and self-confidence.

Reilly added that it is recommended that the tapes are listened

Let's go to the chapel

By SUSAN E. CORCORAN
Features Editor

Twenty-four hours before the doors would open, Christia Grimes was waiting in line. She had grabbed the first spot and she was not about to lose it. A few hours later, David Todd claimed the number two spot and began his long, tiring wait.

Why were these people waiting in line? Just a few more young people willing to wait in the cold to see their favorite rock star? No. These Villanova University alumni were waiting for a chance to do something a little more serious — like getting married.

The chapel on Villanova's campus, the St. Thomas of Villanova Chapel, has for the last five years enjoyed increasing popularity among graduates as the place to get married. The demand is so great that reservations are now being taken 14 months in advance.

Ninety minutes after the chapel office opened August 31 at 8 a.m., the month of November 1989 was completely filled.

Couples feel that the 14 month wait for the chapel is worth it because of their love for Villanova.

"For four years this is the center of their personal and communal lives," said the Rev. Shawn Tracy, O.S.A., director of Campus Ministry.

"They have usually met their spouses here, and it's a place that has great meaning for them spiritually and personally."

The reservations are taken on the first business day of each month. Couples who have waited all night vie for the eight or 10 wedding dates reserved for graduates each month. Only people with Villanova degrees and parishioners may reserve the chapel.

Four wedding times are available on each Saturday; two for graduates and two for parishoners. The fee to rent the chapel is $150.

But the ritual of lining up to reserve the chapel will soon be coming to an end. Campus ministry wants to stop the camping out.

The new procedure will allow graduates to simply phone the parish secretary to reserve their wedding dates — as far in advance as the graduates desire.

Hearing rumors that the reservation procedure was about to change, Beth Ann Curvan, a Villanova senior, was in line last week to get a jump on the new system.

Curvan's anticipated wedding date: June 23, 1990.

Priest makes a difference in Haiti

By BARBARA HAENN

They make movies based on lives such as his. But you will not find him in Hollywood, Washington or Wall Street. His home is the impoverished area of Port-au-Prince, Haiti called Cite Soleil (The City of Sun), and his name is the Rev. Lawrence Bohnen.

A Salesian father, Bohnen left his university teaching post in Belgium 35 years ago to begin the "missionary" chapter of his life. At first, he was assigned to the missions of Vietnam, and within two years, was reassigned to the poorest country in the western hemisphere — Haiti.

Haiti, a Caribbean country about the size of Maryland with 6 million citizens, was a former paradise that has been beaten into poverty over the last 200 years. Once a land rich in natural resources, the earth is now unable to produce economic security for its people as a result of multiple colonizations and exploitive economic practices. The average family income per year is $200, a reality that is difficult for most North Americans to comprehend.

Into this world walked Bohnen, in 1955. He was 42 years old. He realized that the hope of the Haitian people would lie in their enormous faith, and in future educational efforts. His dream was to establish a school system and lunch program that would liberate both body and soul. Over the past 33 years, he has established 151 mini-schools, and a lunch program that feeds 15,000 children 365 days of the year.

It was Villanova's privilege to be able to work with Bohnen when groups of students traveled to Haiti to learn more of the realities of life for people living in the Third World. Hunger Awareness Week, 1986 and 1987, directed their fund raising goals toward successfully financing the building of a school that contains eight additional mini-schools in Bohnen's Cite Soleil compound. The school bears the name of Villanova University.

In recognition of Bohnen's dedication, work and accomplishments for the people of Haiti, Villanova University will award Bohnen an honorary doctorate.

to on a daily basis and that "how effective they are depends upon the person and circumstance. But for people who are motivated and want something to help them, I think they make a difference."

Reilly explained that the use of the learning skills laboratory now is largely channeled through him, but there is potential for the lab to eventually allow students to work more independently or on a walk-in basis. He added, "There are some people who don't want to work with counselors. They'd rather work on their own."

Reilly stated that in the future he would like to build up the kind of resources that allow for more independent work. Moreover, he would eventually like to have computerized tutorial programs available that would fill in the gap for students who are stuck and want a tutor but cannot find one.

If you are interested in the services available at the learning skills laboratory, Reilly can be contacted at 645-4050 in the University Counseling Center.

Sophomores flee to Sullivan

By JIM BOWMAN
Assistant Features Editor

Sure, most of us were shocked when the Brooklyn Dodgers packed up and headed for Los Angles. It was also big news when Ferdinand Marcos left behind his wife Imelda's personal shoe store in his haste to begin a permanent vacation in Hawaii.

However, there are a group of sophomore guys now living in Villanova's Sullivan Hall who would probably swear that those two famous address changes do not even qualify as "culture shock."

They are the St. Mary's alumni, sophomores who have made the transition from the quiet life of north (and that's far north) campus down to Villanova's centrally located version of "Animal House," Sullivan Hall. And right now, they could not be much happier.

"It's a total change in atmosphere," explained former St. Mary's resident Gary Herbert, "and there's always something going on. There's no comparison."

Brett Petersen, another Sullivan Hall sophomore who successfully completed the exodus from St. Mary's, added, "It's a lot better down here. I really didn't feel like I was a part of the school in St. Mary's. It was like off campus-like a boy's school. I was looking forward to coming down here."

Ah, the anticipation. Matt Hatfield, still another St. Mary's alumnus now enjoying the atmosphere of Sullivan, had this to say:

"In a way, it was good living in St. Mary's. It gave us something to look forward to this year. When I think of guys who lived here freshman year, I wonder if they get tired of it.

"For us, it's a nice, steady progression. First St. Mary's, then Sullivan, then off-campus," he added.

Although the atmosphere of central campus is frequently mentioned as a primary advantage of Sullivan Hall, the shortened walks to classes and other dorms are also a major factor.

"You just had to go so far to go anywhere," recalled sophomore Chris Grimes. "It was too ridiculous to walk to main campus in the rain."

Herbert agreed, saying, "The classes were so far away, it was really a hassle."

So let's see, the atmosphere in Sullivan is better, the walks are shorter ... Is there anything else that would make you guys want to live on main campus?

Oh yeah, the girls.

"Sometimes, the people up there were immature," commented Matt Sweeney, who spent his freshman year in a St. Mary's single. "If a girl would walk into St. Mary's, it would be like 'Wow, a girl!' "

"You just didn't see anybody besides guys up there," noted Grimes. "Now you see females. Everywhere."

who knows, who cares

Welcome back campers ... you leave for the summer and they change everything on you ... new president, new logo book, new freshmen ... about 5,000 and the University is still counting ... and of course, there's a new rule for every one of them ... like the ban on take-out food at the cafeteria (obviously too valuable to be removed from the premises) ... the question is, what if it starts walking out on its own? ... and how about those EXIT ONLY doors? They're going to be lots of fun when VU begins its annual rain cycle ... and then there's the new rules on "overt" sex in the Blue Book ... welooked up "overt" — according to the dictionary, it means "easily observable" ... and we thought all those couples in the hallways were just drunk ... anyway, rumor has it that when the dust cleared in the Board room in June, the final score was 12 to 8 (according to reliable sources) ... did the loser get a consolation prize of a ceramic dalmatian? who knows, who cares.

Scorsese sparks controversy

By E.H. MC ELDOWNEY

"The Last Temptation of Christ" directed by Martin Scorsese Universal Pictures

In "The Last Temptation of Christ," director Martin Scorsese has created a Jesus, and a film, that are both very human and extremely real. Scorsese chose to reject a long tradition of previous cinematic portraits of Jesus.

It is a powerful and emotionally packed film. The actors, from Jesus (William Dafoe) to Mary Magdelene (Barbara Hershey) to Pontius Pilate (David Bowie) to Saul (Harry Dean Stanton), interact in a way that pulls the audience into the film. The pain of Jesus, of Judas and of Mary seems so near, it is hard not to feel it. The setting is also striking; it looks and sounds like Galilee could have looked and sounded.

This is not the clean, lucid Hollywood Palestine of "The Greatest Story Ever Told," nor is it the psychedelic abstraction of "Godspell." Scorsese's Jerusalem is a dirty, bloody, violent city under foreign occupation. There are rebellions and rebels looking for leaders and the godless looking for gods.

In this background we are introduced to Jesus, acted with passion and conviction by William Dafoe. Jesus is a man possessed by doubts, insecurities and fear. He's a carpenter and makes crosses for Roman executions so that God will hate him. He seems actually quite insane as he writhes in pain and struggles in his sleep. He claims to be plagued by God, and his fear of God's call is driving him crazy. He tries to resist and desperately wants to live a normal life, but he senses he is being called to something more.

Scorsese's Jesus is a man, struggling to live a holy and good life. He is torn between his human needs of love, companionship and family, and the divine spiritual side of his being which is asking him to sacrifice all that, and even to sacrifice his life. "The Last Temptation" is the story of a Jesus struggling to achieve his divinity. It is a story of becoming.

Much of the controversy has centered around a fantasy/dream sequence toward the end of the film in which Jesus marries, and has sex with Mary Magdelene.

By the end of the film, Jesus has become both a leader to the rebels, and God to the godless. Many of His doubts are gone, He knows He is the Son of God and that He will die on the cross. He preaches love and brings the ax to clear the ground for a new way.

The film is based not upon the Gospels, but upon a novel by Nikos Kazantzakis. Using this fictional account as a basis, gives Scorsese great leeway in his direction. He is not held to the traditional gospel stories or interpretations.

Judas' character is a notable example of this. Judas has always been "the betrayer," the disciple who traded Jesus to the Romans for a purse of silver. The Judas of "The Last Temptation" is depicted as politically motivated. He wants an end to Rome's power in Palestine.

Initially sent to assassinate Jesus by a rebel group, Judas chooses to follow him instead. He feels that Jesus will be the man who will bring the revolution. The men become close friends and Judas serves, helps and plans with Jesus.

Finally, when the time comes for Judas to betray Jesus, he refuses to do it. His love for Jesus is too great. But Jesus is convinced that He must die on the cross, and asks — begs, and convinces Judas to betray Him. The role of Judas is played by Harvey Keitel; he creates a violent, emotional, and ultimately loyal Judas perfectly.

Scorsese has also given a different picture of the apostles, and of what the first Christian community was like. These are not 12 holy men in white who just follow Jesus around. We are given snapshots of each of them as real men. Nathanael worries about his sheep, James and John consider returning to the Sea of Galilee to fish and Simon is called "the rock" only in sarcasm. All the men and women who follow Jesus experience sincere doubt and fear about this strange man whom they call rabbi.

There has been a great deal of controversy riding along with this film. Its detractors claim it is blasphemous and that it demeans the figure of Jesus. I cannot seriously believe that anyone who has seen this film would see the validity in either of those statements. Scorsese has opened questions to find deeper answers and has done nothing for mere shock value or to be radical.

"A Fish Called Wanda" transcends comedy

By GJ DONNELLY
Staff Reporter

"A Fish Called Wanda"
directed by Charles Crichton
MGM/UA Pictures

John Cleese is undoubtedly one of the most gifted comic talents on the planet, and if there were any doubt of that, his new film "A Fish Called Wanda," is sure to erase it. "Wanda" is a comedy not only of fish, but of flattened puppies, bewigged barristers, french-fried filled noses and back-stabbing black humor.

Cleese, late of the innovative Monty Python troupe, stars as Archie Leach (Cary Grant's real name, incidentally), a mildly pompous barrister with a boring job and a boorish family. Archie's life soon gets a twist as he meets up with Wanda, who is an American legal student. Or is she?

Actually, Wanda is one quarter of a gang of thieves who rob valuable jewels from a London bank and stash them in a safe in a nearby garage. Or so it seems. Wanda and her pretend brother, but actual lover Otto, tip off the police in order to cut out the leader of the gang from getting his fair share.

This odd juxtaposition of dark comedy and pathos is juggled nicely by Cleese's intricate and witty script.

His accomplice, the stuttering animal lover Ken (who coincidentally, has a fish in his tank called Wanda) takes the jewels and hides them from Wanda and Otto. Archie becomes involved when he becomes the leader's defense barrister, thus becoming privvy to the whereabouts of the jewels. Or is he?

Confused? Not to worry, for such is the pacing of Wanda that is handled so adeptly by director Charles Crichton, a 78-year-old veteran of numerous British films in the '40s and '50s.

As for the actors, Jamie Lee Curtis shows us she can do more than scream at a psychopath by delivering a seductive and smart performance as Wanda.

Cleese's fellow Python, Michael Palin, is hilarious as Ken, the sensitive killer who has no qualms about bumping off an old woman, but sobs at the death of his fish.

It is Kevin Kline who steals the most laughs as Otto, Wanda's lover and partner in crime. Otto is a man so low even slime would be insulted to be included in the same category. Whether he is bothering Ken, making love while spouting poor Italian, or threatening everyone with the phrase, "Don't call me stupid!," Otto provides more laughs in one scene than many movies do in an hour and a half.

The most remarkable performance, however, is from Cleese

Tommy Conwell makes national album debut

RUMBLE
Tommy Conwell and the Young Rumblers
CBS Records

Tommy Conwell and the Young Rumblers, Philadelphia's favorite blues-rock band, released RUMBLE, their first national album, at the beginning of August. Conwell and his band have been a staple of the Philadelphia music scene since 1984. Paul Slivka (bass) and Jim Hannum (drums) were with Conwell from the start. Rhythm guitarist and voclist, Chris Day, joined later, as did former Hooter, Rob Miller (keyboards/guitar/vocals).

Conwell was born and raised in suburban Philadelphia and attended the University of Delaware. The band developed a strong following of those who identified with Conwell and were attracted to the band's good-natured, hard-rockin' sound.

Tommy Conwell and the Young Rumblers do not sing about nuclear disarmament; they do not have pretentiously complicated arrangements to their songs; they do not wear make-up and spandex and they do not write drawn-out, angst-ridden, wailing songs of lost love. While all of this has its place in the music scene, it's about as far as you can get from Tommy Conwell's style.

The Rumblers write music that is part rock, part blues, mixed with a touch of funk and gospel. Conwell's lyrics are straightforward, thought-out and down-to-earth, in an almost George Thorogood style. In connection to "I'm Not Your Man," RUMBLE's first track, Conwell tells his girl several things she will have to do including, " ... jump off the Empire State in a paper sack," before he will "hang around this old, moldy, mildewed, decrepit scene holding hands with you!"

Four songs on RUMBLE, including "I'm Not Your Man," were on the Walkin' on the Water album, the Rumblers local independent release. These include: "Love's On Fire," on which Conwell collaborated with fellow Philly musician Robert Hazard; "Everything They Say Is True" and "Walkin' On the Water."

New songs on RUMBLE include the gospel-influenced, "Gonna Breakdown" and the low-key, melodic, "If We Never Meet Again." Conwell worked with another Philadelphia songwriter, Marcy Rauer on "Gonna Breakdown" and "If We Never Meet Again" is a Jules Shear composition. Of his collaborations, Conwell said recently, "Collaborating has helped me as a songwriter. After a while, it is lonely writing songs by yourself."

There are several reasons to buy a copy of RUMBLE. The first is for the realistic humor of "I'm Not Your Man." The second is for the love lyrics of "Love's On Fire," which include "Take my hand and take your turn/There's a chnce that you won't get hurt/Take a chance that you can't return/Love's on fire but it don't burn."

Buy RUMBLE for "Gonna Breakdown," a departure in Conwell's past sound — a departure that hopefully will be repeated. RUMBLE is also worth purchasing to hear the "Texan trick" on "Everything They Say Is True." A "Texan trick" means that a guitar is played directly into an amp that is usually used for organs.

23 East Show

The week before RUMBLE was released, the band played for two nights at the 23 East Cabaret in Ardmore. During the Agust 5 show, there was energy in the crowd and on stage, as the band played for one of the last times as only a "local" band. Conwell was very gracious to his fans that night, thanking them for all their support. Before introducing "Do You Still Believe In Me," he said, "I was gonna say that this song is for all our old friends, but then I realized that all of you are our old friends."

Conwell did a lot of participation with the audience. During "Truck Drivin' Song," he walked on top of one bar, jumped into the audience and played his guitar while walking all the way around the second bar.

The Rumblers played both old standards and new songs to promote the album. Conwell was quite upfront abut the band's intentions, "Do me a personal favor and buy a copy" [of the album]. He also pointed out that the video for the album's first single, "I'm Not Your Man," was filmed at the 23 East. "This is our home, the 23 East."

Now that the band has been signed to Columbia, a national label, and have released an album that has built-in regional prospective buyers, Tommy Conwell and the Young Rumblers have transcended "just a local Philly band" status. Hopefully their straightforward rock will survive the "Oh, put more make-up on me for my MTV video" mindset of much of the music industry.

Literary gem released

By ROBERT DUGGAN
Staff Reporter

Ever since his 1983 Pulitzer Prize-winning novel, Ironweed, William Kennedy has been one of the most acclaimed novelists in America. Quinn's Book, his latest novel, is a fine addition to his already excellent body of work.

Kennedy's novels deal mostly with the lore he has collected about Albany, N.Y., where he began his career as a reporter for the Albany Times-Union. Ironweed (which was made into a film last year starring Jack Nicholson and Meryl Streep) and the other previous books in Kennedy's "Albany Cycle" dealt with the town during the Depression. In Quinn's Book, he reaches back further into the middle of the 19th century.

The book opens in the winter of 1849. Daniel Quinn relates his story as an assistant to a Hudson River ferryman named John the Brawn. Quinn, an orphan, scrounges a meager existence out of what John gives him, while always looking for an escape route to a better life.

As a promotional stunt, an actress named Magdalena Colon, "La Ultima," challenges the Hudson ferrymen to take her and her entourage across the treacherous, half-frozen river. After finding a taker, their boat is destroyed in mid-river and Daniel and John go out to rescue the passengers.

John pulls the actress out of the icy waters as Daniel saves Maud, her niece, and begins a two-decade adventure revolving about this "wondrous" child-woman.

The boatmen take the women to the mansion of Hillegond Staats, matriarch of the rich Dutch family. It is here that Maud and Daniel fall in love and Daniel is introduced to a grander world that will one day allow them to finally be together.

Daniel is accepted by the motherly Mrs. Staats and uses her patronage to discover the world and win Maud. He eventually becomes a newspaperman and later a Civil War correspondent for Horace Greeley.

Kennedy fills Daniel's adventures with the various slices of 19th century Albany life he has amassed. He draws a striking portrait of Daniel's childhood with stories of the horrible plagues of the period, the wretched life of the plague-created orphans and the sad, yet proud, "famine Irish" immigrating to America to find only discrimination.

Kennedy also deals with the Civil War through the eyes of Daniel the reporter. At times, this slips into a drum-beating, sentimental monologue, but Kennedy always returns to his highly-detailed, realistic best.

The horrors of the period are tempered by his capturing of the color of the times. The grandiose theater, the spiritualism craze and the love of sports such as bare-knuckled boxing and horseracing are all vividly presented.

Kennedy is incredible in his ability to create detail in even the most minute passages. Nothing is ever thrown away. He fills in every corner of every room, every second of every scene, and it is very easy to lose sight of the whole story in this dense forest of visual detail.

The narrative often tries to imitate the florid, excessive newspaper style of the times and also helps to re-create the atmosphere of the 1800s.

The only criticisms that can be made of Kennedy are in his characters and his use of narrative voice. The characters in Quinn's Book are too representative of specific literary types in some instances, especially John the Brawn. In other cases, they are so mysterious that they seem more like literary devices than real people. This problem is most noticeable in Maud, whose motivations and desires are as much a puzzlement to the reader as they are to Daniel, if not more so.

Kennedy also shifts the narrative voice from the first-person narrative of Daniel to omniscient third person with no clear transition, causing confusion in regards to who is really speaking.

Despite these slight flaws, Quinn's Book is a fantastic historical novel that fully displays the imaginative talents of William Kenndey.

Christ

Much of the controversy has centered around a fantasy/dream sequence toward the end of the film in which Jesus marries, and has sex with Mary Magdelene. It is made clear early on in the film that Jesus has needs, fears and emotions, among them lust. So this scene is in no way surprising. It seems necessary that a Jesus who is to judge and forgive sins must have had knowledge of them.

The scene at the last supper, before Jesus is betrayed, gives perhaps a better idea of the reverence with which Scorsese has filled this movie. Here is Jesus surrounded by His friends, and His followers, as well as the outcast prostitute Mary Magdelene and the sisters Mary and Martha. They share the meal as Jesus breaks bread and gives them wine.

Scorsese's Jesus is a man, struggling to live a holy and good life.

As He speaks the words "do this in memory of Me," Simon is surprised to find blood, not wine, in his cup. The scene is very peaceful, yet tense for the audience because they know what is to come soon. Somehow it is very beautiful in its simplicity. The feeling I was left with made me see that this was important, vital and meant to be remembered.

Scorsese makes it clear as the movie opens, that this film is not based on the Gospels. That fact alone does not mean that it is not relevant and does not make it blasphemy. It is evident that this film was crafted with love and faith from its actors as well as its director. This was evident in the performances, in the scenes and in the reactions of the patrons leaving the theatre.

It is a movie that challenges. It forces viewers to think about themselves and their faith. Part of faith for me involves change and new perspectives.

"Last Temptation" is, most simply, a film about faith. See this film if you are looking to face hard questions, and are ready to grow.

Reruns dominate T V

By STEPHEN POWERS
Staff Reporter

Tired of those endless reruns? Get used to them, because the five-month-long writers' strike, which ended last month, has pushed the start of the new fall season back at least a month for most television programs, and even more for others.

NBC is the network that has been the least affected by the strike. In two weeks, the network will roll out 180 hours of coverage of the 1988 Summer Olympics from Seoul, and then will introduce its new schedule, piecemeal, in the weeks that follow. "Baby Boom," based on the feature film of the same name, and starring Kate Jackson in the Diane Keaton role, will have a special preview on Sept. 10, but will not be seen again until November. Returning first, during the week of Oct. 3, are: "Alf," "The Hogans," "The Cosby Show," "A Different World," "227," "Amen" and "The Golden Girls." In addition, "Empty Nest" and Judd Hirsch's "Dear John" premiere that week.

ABC's first "new" series, a revival of "That's Incredible" entitled "Incredible Sunday," turns up on Oct. 9. The alphabet network's first returning shows appear the week of Oct. 17: "Who's the Boss?" "Growing Pains" and "Head of the Class."

Roseanne Barr's new sitcom, "Roseanne," also debuts that week. Most of the ABC schedule will fall into place during late October and early November, with some notable exceptions: "Moonlighting" will not return until Dec. 6, and the rotating "Saturday Mystery Movie," which includes Peter Falk in "Columbo," has been postponed, to be replaced temporarily by remakes of "Police Story."

Out of the three networks, CBS was definitely hit the hardest by the strike. A few new and returning series will appear during the last week of October (the night-time soaps, "The Equalizer," "Wiseguy," "The Van Dyke Show," "Mary Tyler Moore") but most of the schedule will not be in place until the end of November, giving the competition a head-start. Until then, CBS will fill its nights with movies, miniseries and temporary programs like "Live! Dick Clark Presents," new episodes of "Simon and Simon" and the new magazine, "High Risk."

Out of the three networks, CBS was definitely hit the hardest by the strike.

A DIFFERENT "WORLD": When NBC's "Cosby Show" spinoff, "A Different World," returns next month, viewers may wonder if they are watching the same show at all. Dissatisfied with the series' freshman year, Bill Cosby has ordered some major changes, including the hiring of new producer Debbie Allen, best known for her work in the TV version of "Fame."

"World" star Lisa Bonet will not appear in the show for at least the first part of the year; instead, her character will "take some time off from school" and Bonet will do six episodes of "Cosby" before her maternity leave. Though she may be back for later episodes of "World," nothing has been worked out yet. Co-star Marisa Tomei (Maggie) is also being written out of the show.

The new "World" will revolve around Jaleesa (Dawnn Lewis), Whitley (Jasmine Guy), Dwayne (Kadeem Hardison), their new roommates and several faculty members.

HERE COME THE BRADYS: Get ready, "Brady Bunch" fans — America's favorite family is getting back together. All but one member of the original cast of the 1969-74 ABC sitcom will reunite, this time on CBS, in December for "A Very Brady Christmas," in which Mike and Carol Brady are grandparents. Missing is Susan Olsen (Cindy), who is now a top designer and declined to participate in the movie. Jennifer Runyon, late of "Charles in Charge," takes over the role.

It has been almost seven years since the Bradys last appeared, in NBC's "The Brady Girls Get Married," which led to the short-lived "Brady Brides" series. There are no plans at this time to do another series; the movie is a one-shot deal.

SHORT TAKES: Last week's Emmy show on Fox got the "fourth network" its highest rating ever. One interesting note: John Larroquette, of NBC's "Night Court," won his fourth consecutive Emmy as best supporting actor in a comedy ... Bette Midler, in her first dramatic role since 1979's "The Rose," stars in "Beaches," opening next month ... This summer turned out to be one of the most successful in box office history, with "Who Framed Roger Rabbit" pulling in close to $150 million. Biggest disappointment: Sylvester Stallone's "Rambo III," which earned only $50 million, barely more than the cost of production.

Female artists speak out

By MICHAEL AIMETTE and BILL CARR
Staff Reporters

The summer months offered quite a few musical surprises, the most interesting being the re-emergence of women as serious musical entities. This transformation from Barbie-dolls to serious musicians began with the growing popular acceptance of bands like 10,000 Maniacs and Suzanne Vega, and has peaked with the overwhelming success of Tracy Chapman. Gone (almost) are the days of jiggling babes dancing around on MTV; these women have something to say.

Tracy Chapman is possibly the best example of that, dealing with such sobering topics as poverty, politics and racism. Other excellent emerging artists include Marti Jones, Toni Childs, and Sinead O'Connor — each offering various styles, yet all improving the lot of women in the popular music scene.

The second trend worth noting is the lack of any new interesting college bands. For instance, the current No. 1 college band, The Sugarcubes, is a gimmicky Siouxsie and the Banshees rip-off from Iceland.

Shriekback, another relatively new college group, is little more than the typical British dance band.

The second trend worth noting is the lack of any new interesting college bands.

The few good college albums released this summer were made by previously established groups: Camper Van Beethoven, Graham Parker, Talking Heads, and the aforementioned Tracy Chapman and Marti Jones ...

Jimmy Page released Outrider in June, which proved to be an overall disappointment. His two instrumentals are easily the best songs on the album, since the singers Page chose for the rest of the album are truly awful; practically ruining every song. Robert Plant guest vocals on "The Only One," which is pretty decent — buy his album instead. Better yet, just buy any Zeppelin record ... Steve Winwood manufactured Roll With It, another typically marketable product. Winwood played it very safe, breaking no new ground — should sell about 5 or 6 million ... Guns 'N' Roses made the best metal album in years (at least since Back In Black) ... Robert Palmer released Heavy Nova (see Steve Winwood)

Now we are going to let a random group of spandex-wearing teeny boppers decide what the public should listen to?

NEW STUFF

Bon Jovi, those enormously successful rockers from New Jersey, are getting set to release their follow-up to Slippery When Wet, the Jovi album that has sold 13 million copies to date. The new album will be called New Jersey, named after the state presumably, and will be in stores by Sept. 19. The album was originally going to be called Sons of Beaches; the band is to be commended for their use of good judgment here.

However, Bon Jovi's use of judgment was quite dubious elsewhere. In the recording process, Bon Jovi called 50 kids into the studio, played them all their current material, and asked the kids to pick the songs that they wanted for the album. What kind of bad joke is this? Once, pop music was a serious form of self-expression. Now we are going to let a random group of spandex-wearing teeny boppers decide what the public should listen to? How seriously can Jon Bon Jovi be taken if he has such little respect, or faith, in his own songs?

Guitarist Richie Sambora defended the move, saying, "If you put on a rock show and you don't sell any tickets, and if you put out a record and nobody buys it, it's pretty boring."

And you do not make millions of dollars, do you? Hopefully, although the current music scene would seem to indicate otherwise, rock and roll has not become entirely submissive to the will of 13-year olds and the drive towards monetary success.

Echo and The Bunnymen have unfortunately disbanded due to lead singer Ian McCulloch's desire to pursue a solo career. McCulloch apparently has an album in the works ... Many long-awaited albums will be out soon: U2's Rattle And Hum, a mostly live double album that will be released in connection with a feature film (of the same name) which documents U2's most recent American tour; R.E.M. has two new releases coming out, one in October, a best-of compilation that will contain new mixes of old tunes and some rarities, and a brand new album due in early November. The new album will be especially notable because it marks R.E.M.'s first album under its new record label, Warner Brothers ...

Summer concerts sizzle in Philadelphia

ROBERT PLANT

By TIM DANIELS
Staff Reporter

Robert Plant's visit to the Spectrum on May 23 was met with high expectations, but he did not fail to enthuse the sold-out arena. The excitement surrounding the tour built as his new record, Now and Zen, revealed a return to his hard rock roots, and reached No. 1 on the charts. Also, Plant was just coming off a much heralded reunion with his Led Zeppelin band mates at the Atlantic Records 40th Anniversary party. The result was the most anticipated Plant tour since the Zeppelin demise.

Plant's performance spanned his entire career: Zeppelin to Zen. From his Zeppelin days, Plant pulled out "In the Evening," "Trampled Under Foot," and "Misty Mountain Hop." Plant's vocals were excellent throughout. However the musical performances lacked in emotion-evoking quality.

His early solo career was featured as well. The highlights included the energetic "Big Log," and the subdued "In The Mood." Plant performed practically the entire new album spread throughout the evening, with the band providing its best performances. The hits "Heaven Knows" and "Tall Cool One" were excellent. Also, "Ship of Fools" and a speeded up version of "White, Clean, and Neat" were especially well received.

Stevie Ray Vaughan and Double Trouble opened for Plant's tour, kicking off an 18-month world tour of their own. The 55-minute set was tremendous, featuring the tightest playing since Vaughn's drug problems, and including most of his finest songs. The best performances were provided by "Voodoo Chile," "Pride and Joy" and "Life Without You."

With Robert Plant's soulful singing, and Stevie Ray Vaughan spreading the blues news, this show proved to be a great one to launch the summer concert season..

AC/DC

By JEFF GILLIES
Assistant Entertainment Editor

AC/DC shook the Spectrum in May with a night of explosive rock and roll and wild stage antics. Although the sound quality was not exactly the best, the band did their best to please the enthusiastic crowd. The stage itself was impressive and the light show was excellent, but unfortunately, the concert was somewhat dissapointing.

The opening act, L.A. Guns were simply incredible and upstaged AC/DC to an almost embarassing point. L.A. Guns are one of the newest bands on the heavy metal scene and certainly impressed the Spectrum crowd. They played a remarkable version of Led Zeppelin's "Dazed and Confused" that sent the Spectrum into a frenzy.

AC/DC made the mistake of trying too hard to promote their latest album, Blow Up Your Video. The time they spent playing the mediocre new material could have been better spent on songs such as "For Those About to Rock" that were left out of the set.

The performance was tight and Angus Young's guitar wizardry was electrifying. "You Shook Me All Night Long" had the crowd on their feet and screaming along with Brian Johnson. This was without doubt the highlight of the evening, as the noise level in the arena was ear-shattering.

"Hell's Bells" was also extremely well played and the lights dimmed to reveal a giant bell hovering above the stage, as the crowd once again erupted with screaming.

Angus Young never stopped bashing his head and his leg seemed to be possessed by some evil spirit that would not stop shaking it. Donning his traditional schoolboy outfit, Young led the show and made sure things never got quiet. He raised his hand in the air and the noise level skyrocketed. At one point, during a solo, Young dropped his pants before the crowd. This antic got the crowd going more than anything else, which is probably an indication that the band was doing something wrong.

"It's a Long Way to the Top," "Shake Your Foundations" and "Have a Drink on Me" were all mysteriously left out of the set. In addition, the band seemed a little too anxious to get off the stage, as the concert was barely 90 minutes long. A band with such a long and impressive history such as AC/DC could certainly have played longer.

The show was entertaining and abundant with energy, but the poor song selection and sound quality took away from what should have been an excellent concert. AC/DC may be heading toward the point where they should call it quits. Hopefully, this is not the case.

INXS

by VICKI DISTEFANO
Staff Reporter

The Australian band INXS kicked in two powerful performances at the Spectrum on Aug. 20 and 21. Both dates were sold out: Ziggy Marley and the Melody Makers were the opening act.

Reggae enthusiasts who attended the event to enjoy Marley's calypso rhythms were taken by storm when INXS erupted on stage. The manic intensity increased with every set.

Lead vocalist Michael Hutchence seduced the audience. His distinctive voice complimented his powerful stage presence. Onstage, his vocals were punctuated by his dexterous impromptu choreography. Hutchence utilized every square inch of the stage and remained in perpetual motion for the duration of the concert. Union himself, who plays Archie as a man straining to be free of his own English sense of dignity and pomposity. It is this which makes "A Fish Called Wanda" more than just a zany comedy. Archie is a very reserved human being who is placed in a very extraordinary situation and despite this, one is easily able to empathize with his character.

'Fish Called Wanda'

This odd juxtaposition of dark comedy and pathos is juggled nicely by Cleese's intricate and witty script. Much like his humor in Python and Fawity Towers, Cleese's sense of comedic logic sets ott just the right mishap to create a slew of separate lunatic incidents culminating in a disharmonious whole and a comic climax. If that is not enough, director Crichton provides us with some marvelous shots of London in his camera angles.

Cleese himself said recently in People magazine that the film is his "most satisfying project to date" and upon watching it is esy to see why. I dare say that there is a lot of John Cleese in Archie Leach, and the fact that he is able to show this in a film as unpredictable and crazy as "Wanda" is a credit to him as both a writer and as an actor. Whatever the case, just see it for yourself. You will not miss that $5 admission.

Monsters of Rock stop in Philly

with each song he sings is not contrived; Hutchence is responsible for co-writing almost every song that INXS has recorded to date.

The band's repertoire material from Kick, their current LP, including the title track. Singles from this album, namely "Devil Inside," "New Sensation," and "I Need You Tonight," were played in every set. Despite the overexposure of these tunes due to extensive airplay, INXS managed to make them sound fresh and spontaneous.

A dramatic rendition of "Tear Us Apart," the latest release from Kick, was arguably the band's most memorable offering all night. The group elicited audience participation; the response was overwhelming.

INXS did not disappoint their fans who anticipated music from previous albums. An extended version of the MTV classic "Original Sin" highlighted the closing set. "This Time" and "What You Need," prime cuts from the Listen Like Thieves album, were played to the hilt and sounded better than ever.

INXS's innovative musical approach could convert the most militant opponent of the "new music" genre. Attending a concert by this unfailingly energetic quintet is recommended to anybody who needs relief from the contemporary "Top 40 Pop Trash" scene.

By RUSS CECCOLA
Special To The Villanovan

On June 11, an event came to Philadelphia that was supposed to be the greatest outdoor hard rock/metal show ever. Unfortunately, all the hype in the world could not take away the feeling of being ripped off by the time it was all over. This feeling is largely Van Halen's fault because their name was written everywhere, from the shirts to the tickets. The event was Monsters of Rock and the show traveled to 22 cities in the United States over the summer, with the lineup of bands from start to finish of Kingdom Come, Metallica, Dokken, Scorpions and Van Halen.

What started out as a good idea really turned sour. Originally, there were going to be two stadium tours, with different bands in each, so that in one summer, American audiences could see every major metal act. Rumors had Ozzy Osbourne, Judas Priest, Iron Maiden, Anthrax and others going out for the second round of the Monsters of Rock tour. But that was all they amounted to — rumors. Actually, that would have been a better tour than the one new Van Halen put together. The foursome claimed that every band on the bill would play a full set and have full use of the stage. What a lie! Kingdom Come had 35 minutes, Metallica 45, Dokken an hour, Scorpions an hour and a quarter and Van Halen over two hours. Something was just not right.

Kingdom Come

Because Kingdom Come (Clone) have no real original talent and have not stood the test of time, there is no reason they should have been on the tour, except as a record company ploy.

Metallica

Opening with "Creeping Death," Metallica, the kings of thrash, gave the best performance of the day because their minds have not grown commercial or numb with success. Their honesty shines through and did on such numbers as "Last Caress/ Green Hell," "Welcome Home (Sanitarium)," "Seek & Destroy," "Damage, Inc." and "Whiplash." The foursome of James Hetfield, Lars Ulrich, Kirk Hammett and Jason Newsted proved that their next album will most certainly outsell any metal album of before. There are kids just dying to run to record stores in droves the day it comes out and Metallica gave a sample of the new album called And Justice For All in the form of "Harvester of Sorrows."

Dokken

Dokken was up next and, besides Don Dokken looking like Fish from Marillion, the band played a very standard set. George Lynch gave the crowd his typically excellent guitar work and bassist Jeff Pilson and drummer Mick Brown kept the background beat going. Dokken showcased such classics as "Tooth and Nail," "Just Got Lucky," "In My Dreams," "So Many Tears," "Burning Like A Flame" and "It's Not Love" and showed how they rule the melodic metal genre. All in all, Dokken gave a very good performance as well.

Scorpion

Next up was the band that people had been waiting to see for years. Having just received the first new songs in the form of Savage Amusement in over four years, Scorpion fans went wild when their German heroes hit the stage. Starting out with "Breakout," Scorpions mixed "Don't Stop At The Top," "Rhythm of Love" and "Every Minute Every Day" with their classics like "No One Like You," "Rock You Like a Hurricane" and "The Zoo." Klaus Meine (vocals), Rudolf Schenker (guitars), Matthias Jabs (guitars), Francis Buchholz (bass) and Hermann Rarebell (drums) showed Philadelphia the Scorpions they had been dying to see and elicited the greatest crowd response and sing-alongs of the day, with Metallica a very close second in this department.

Van Halen

Van Halen came on and proceeded to use those parts of the set that no other bands did, played longer than others and sounded really bad for the first few songs. Something happened for the worse when David Lee Roth left the band. A guy like Sammy Hagar, with the worst-looking hair in America, cannot cut it. Let us face it — Van Halen took on a really bad attitude for this tour. If you get rid of them and Kingdom Clone and add time to the other bands' sets, the event might have been really special. Thanks for nothing, Van Halen.

Metal bands expand their horizons

LONG COLD WINTER
Cinderella
Mercury Records

Cinderella has overcome the sophomore jinx through a rather bold move. Rather than churning out a follow-up to their highly successful Night Songs, Cinderella has practically re-invented their musical style on Long Cold Winter. The stadium rocking anthems such as "Shake Me" are nowhere to be found on the new album. Instead, the band decides to sing the blues, heavy metal style.

The blues influence is most prevalent on the opening tracks of both sides. "Bad Seamstress Blues" and "Long Cold Winter" are slower and have steady and repetitious beats. The traditional blues themes of suffering and traveling are incorporated into the majority of the songs to enhance the blues influence in the music.

However, Cinderella has not completely abandoned their screaming, rapid guitar fire style. "Gypsy Road" and "Falling Apart at the Seams" are both searing rockers. Singer Tom Keifer certainly does his share of screaming on the album and Fred Coury's forceful drumming provides an excellent background to the leads.

It is extremely clear that the band was highly concerned with broadening their horizons when they made this album.

The real surprise on this album, however, is not the blues style. Ever since Cinderella began working on the album, Keifer was hinting the band would take that direction. The shocker here is the presence of two ballads, "Don't Know What You Got (Til It's Gone)" and "Coming Home," which add a new dimension to a previously limited musical approach. It is extremely clear that the band was highly concerned with broadening their horizons when they made this album.

Although Keifer's course and scratchy voice was not exactly tailor-made for singing ballads, the songs are among the album's best. There is a strong sense of power behind Keifer's vocals that makes up for his lack of innate talent. In this sense, he is comparable to Bruce Springsteen, as both easily overcome the absence of a clear, smooth voice.

Overall Long Cold Winter is an above average hard rock/heavy metal album. The diversity of the music makes it enjoyable to listen to over and over again. It will be interesting to see what Cinderella has in store for their next album. So far, things look promising for this young band.

OU812
Van Halen
Warner Brothers Records

Van Halen has done enough bragging about their latest creation, OU812, that one would think that it should be dipped in gold and donated to the Metropolitan. Needless to say, the boys have been overwhelmingly conceited, a tradition dating back to the David Lee Roth days.

OU812 marks a change in direction from its predecessor, 5150, and perhaps this is why Van Halen is so pleased with their accomplishment. As the title implies, the writing style returns to the old Van Halen and Sammy Hagar approach of tongue in cheek, sometimes deadly straightforward songs about sex. "Black and Blue," clearly the best song on the album with its solid backbeat and steady rhythm, rivals George Michael's "I Want Your Sex" as the dirtiest song on the airwaves.

Social commentary, a concept that no one ever dreamed Van Halen even knew the meaning of, is the opening statement on the album. "Mine All Mine" is a gripping, angered plea to put an end to the scandal ridden television evangelist market. The song shows some real intelligence and offers genuinely sound advice to those pouring their money into these so-called ministries.

In the midst of all the driving, hard rock tunes on OU812, "When It's Love" fits in nicely as the one soft ballad. The opening lines sound dangerously close to Hagar's "Two Sides of Love" from his solo days. However, the song has all the makings of a Van Halen classic that will keep it on the charts for some time. The song is comparable to 5150's "Why Can't This Be Love," but hopefully will not be as overplayed on the radio.

All in all, OU812 is a fast paced album that should appeal to the band's longtime fans, as well as those who jumped on the 5150 bandwagon. The keyboards are still woven into the music, but Van Halen seems to have rediscovered the guitar orientated style that propelled the band to success in the first place. Although OU812 is not as hard as those who prefer older Van Halen material would like it to be, it is a step in that direction.

INXS, George Michael also rock the city

George Michael

By KATHRYN QUIGLEY
Entertainment Editor

George Michael whipped the Spectrum crowd into a hormonal frenzy during his show on Aug. 10. Michael, formerly of the British duo, Wham!, brought his first solo U.S. tour to Philadelphia for two sold-out shows.

Michael has been steadfastly recreating himself since he left Wham! Gone are the shorts and long hair of "Wake Me Up Before You Go-Go" days. What remains is the energetic stage presence, the uncanny ability to write a hit pop song and . . . the body. During the concert, it was often hard to tell which was getting more applause, Michael's talent or his rear end.

He was dressed in black and his trademark facial scruff while he performed most of the songs off his Faith album. Michael began and ended the show with the provocative and controversial, "I Want Your Sex." He also sang "Careless Whisper" and "Different Corner" to appease the Wham! fans.

The only sign of Michael's recent throat surgery was that he sometimes substituted a low note where it should have been high, and he had the crowd sing the first two verses of "Faith."

In Michael's backing band was Deon Estus, Michael's longtime bass player. Estus' own band was the opening act. Lynn Mabry added excellent vocals and did a steamy bump-and-grind with Michael while singing the '70s single, "Voulez-vous Couchez Avec Moi."

While Michael may have shed his Wham! image, his songs and performances will insure that he will never lose his hordes of lusting fans.

Talley leads Wildcat football back

By JOHN G. RICCO
Sports Editor

Though every loss is disappointing, Villanova's 31-11 defeat at the hands of Wake Forest last Saturday has to be somewhat satisfying for Head Coach Andy Talley. The Deamon Deacons represented the Wildcats first Division I football opponent in eight years and thus culminated a four-year rebuilding process started by Talley when he arrived at V.U. in 1984.

Villanova dropped football in 1980 after 87 years of competition because the program was becoming a financial burden on the school. This decision received much criticism from both students and alumni, however, and in December 1983 the Board of Trustees approved a proposal to reinstate the fall sport.

In May 1984, Athletic Director Dr. Theodore Aceto chose Talley to head the rebuilding process.

Though he was faced with the difficult task of starting an entire program from scratch, Talley began his job with optimism and determination. In his first and maybe his best move as head coach, Talley aligned V.U. for entry into the Yankee Conference by the 1988 season.

This move not only told prospective recruits that Villanova had a long-term commitment to football, but showed fans that 'Nova would be back in just four short years.

Talley's strategy paid back dividends immediately as V.U. signed 25 recruits to NCAA national letters of intent in February 1985. An additional 67 walk-ons joined the squad later that year and the resurrected V.U. program was ready to go.

"We thought the formula for a successful rebuilding process was that we needed to win as many games as we could early on," Talley said. And that is just what they did.

In their first season back, mainly against Division III opponents, V.U. recorded a 5-0 record, winning their contests by an average of 28 points. Convincing wins over Pace and Iona highlighted a year which served to successfully put the Villanova football program back on its feet.

Nineteen eighty-six saw Talley add another fine recruiting class to his squad as well as some tougher opponents to his schedule. Even against Division II competition, however, the Wildcats fared extremely well posting an 8-1 mark.

Talley's Cats took another giant step forward in 1987 with their first Yankee Conference opponents, and a schedule made up primarily of Division IAA clubs. The team's 6-4 record and wins over conference rivals Massachusetts and Boston University indicated V.U. football was rapidly growing into a competitive Division IAA program.

While the first three seasons of Talley's regime were filled with increasingly tougher opponents, in 1988 Talley felt the time was right to "jump right in with two feet."

"We thought it was important for our kids to get the experience of winning before anything else," Talley said. "Eventually, however, you have to wean yourself off of the weaker opponents and step up and play some tougher competition." And according to this season's schedule, the time has come.

In addition to a full Yankee Conference slate and the Wake Forest game, 'Nova faces tough road contests at Bucknell on Sept. 10 and William & Mary on Oct. 22.

It appears that this year will indeed mark the complete return of V.U. football, an idea which was just a dream four short years ago. Let's hope this time it is here for good.

Athlete of the Week

SHARON SEIZ

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is Sharon Seiz.

Seiz, a forward for Wildcat field hockey, led the team to consecutive wins last week over Bucknell and Kent State. On Sept. 2, Seiz scored the only goal of the first half, and assisted on one of the two goals in the second to lead Nova to a 3-0 victory.

On Sept. 3, Seiz scored three goals, two of which were unassisted, and registered three assists on the remaining three goals of the game, as the Cats charged to victory over Kent State.

Seiz seems to be on the way to leading the Wildcats into a division title chase.

West in Olympic Trials

Senior Doug West (Altoona, PA) was invited to participate in the United States Olympic Basketball Trials held May 18 to 24. West survived the first cut of this talented field before being eventually released by Coach John Thompson.

West, a second team All BIG EAST selection last season, is expected to be an instrumental part of this year's Villanova men's basketball team.

Craig named hockey coach

The Villanova Men's Ice Hockey team has named a new head coach. Bruce Craig will begin his reign as the Ice Cats' mentor this fall.

Nova's former coach, Skip Probst, resigned his coaching duties in August to assume the role of general manager for the Peoria Rivermen of the International Hockey League. The Ice Cats finished with a 7-16-1 record last season.

Soccer drops opener despite fine defense

By JOE GUARINO
Staff Reporter

Led by a strong defense, the 1988 Villanova men's soccer team has high aspirations for a winning season. "Our defense is there. The question is whether or not we can score goals," commented Wildcat Coach Chris Jones.

Key members of Coach Jones' defense include sophomores Mike Deegan and Steve Grello, and juniors Rich Forberg and Joe Reteneller. Seniors Gary Bagin and Jim Cowan anchor this talented defense. Cowan, from Rockville Centre, N.Y., is a co-captain for the 1988 season. The other captain, goalie Ron Klos, holds a Villanova University record for shutouts in a career.

Offensively, the team has been plagued by injuries to key members. Freshman Ken Santos will miss half of the season while another freshman, Richard Maue, has been lost for the entire season with a broken ankle. These first year players would have offered considerable help to the Wildcat offense.

In the team's only encounter of the season thus far, they lost a hard-fought 1-0 decision to Penn State. The Nittany Lions are currently ranked 19th in the country. "We played well. They were lucky to escape with a 1-0 victory," commented Coach Jones.

Key games upcoming for the Wildcats include LaSalle and Mount Saint Mary's. These will be tune-up games for their Big East opener on Sept. 14, against a Seton Hall squad that is ranked ninth nationwide and first regionally.

The strength and experience of their defense should lead the Wildcats to success in their 1988 Big East schedule. "I have yet to see what other players will emerge as leaders on offense," concluded Jones.

Coach Chris Jones is pleased with the strong defense shown in the game against Penn State.

Baseball finishes second

"I am very disappointed with the loss to St. John's as are the players," Bennett said. "It was very tragic for us because we had beaten St. John's three times this year. They outbatted us, though. We had better material, but they played better than us the last few days."

In the two victories prior to the bitter St. John's losses, Villanova topped St. John's, 7-1, and Seton Hall, 8-2.

Dave Carr and Dan Farren both collected two hits and two RBI's in the win over the Redmen, while, in the win over the Pirates, Mike Wiser led the way with two home runs.

That would be all the bright spots for the Cats, however. In the championship round they fell behind early to the Redmen, but behind Bill Ellis' 3-for-4, three RBI performance, came back and took the lead.

That lead would be short-lived, though, for in the seventh inning Mike Weinberg of St. John's belted a two-out, three-run home run to give the New York school an 8-6 advantage. V.U. never recovered, and lost.

The next day Villanova's woes continued. V.U. could only muster four hits off Redmen pitchers, Tom Singer and Glen Bratteng.

Corey Williamson was the Cats only threat offensively pounding out three hits. So, Villanova was eliminated and St. John's went on to the NCAA tournament.

"This was definitely a disappointing end. Since we lost the year before (1987), we had been striving to win the Big East this year. We were all gung-ho about the tournament and that's why it was such a disappointment when we lost. If we do not win it next year, it will be a greater disappointment," 1989 co-captain Frank Matrone said.

In '89 the Cats should have a very good shot to win the conference. They lost only five seniors to graduation and inked many high quality recruits. In addition, they return many standouts including McCreary, Novoa and Scott.

"These kids are going to go a long way in 1989," Bennett said. "They came out with the best attitude I have seen in all of my years coaching."

would come no closer. The final score was 31-11 in favor of Wake Forest.

Coach Talley, however, remained optimistic after the loss and predicted good things for his team. "We are a good football team and will be an outstanding team by season's end. I have no doubt about it."

Shulz was optimistic as well about the Cats. "It took a lot of guts for us to come back like we did in the second half. Though we made a few mistakes, we really took it to them in the second half. Our team has got a lot of heart."

With an outlook like that, the Cats most likely will be back to make a run at the conference title as they begin their inaugural season in the Yankee Conference.

On the ball

The National Football League began its 69th season last weekend. But this season seems to be different than the 68 seasons that have preceded it.

This season, the league has slapped numerous suspensions on key players for "non-football related illnesses." In other words, the NFL is finally taking a hard-line approach against drug abuse.

The position by the league should not surprise anyone. Social awareness toward this grave problem has peaked and for the first time, the drug problem has become one of the focal points of a presidential campaign. The other "major" sports (baseball, basketball and hockey) have taken strong action against the problem and it appears to be the NFL's turn.

Everyone seems to agree that there is a problem, but the means of solving this problem is where the controversy lies. The debate ranges from how long these suspensions should last, to how many offenses should be tolerated before ultimate banishment from the sport, to what specific drugs constitute substance abuse, to who should conduct the testing. The clouding of this issue has been endless.

The issue, though, seems to me to be quite clear. Use of illegal substance is both wrong and against the laws of this nation. Nobody seems to question the convictions of drug users and dealers that are constantly publicized by the media. Why do we have such a hard time convicting athletes who commit the same crimes?

Athletes are put on a pedestal in this country. They are perceived as heroes by millions of Americans and are idolized by our youth who aspire to be like them. Many of these heroes conduct themselves and serve as good role models for our youth, but the ones who do not must not be the ones that our youth attempt to imitate.

A separation must be made between the good ones and the bad ones and, in essence, what is right and what is wrong. The bottom-line is that the future of America must not be led to believe that drug abuse is acceptable in any way, shape or form.

The place to start has to be with the media. The media has the most influence on social attitudes and beliefs in this country.

The fact that ABC News named New York Giants' linebacker Lawrence Taylor the "Person of the Week" shortly after his highly publicized suspension does not represent progress.

Taylor not only was a second offender, but he did not even come forward on his own. The only reason he is receiving treatment now is because the NFL caught him with their random drug testing program. This hardly seems like someone who should be admired or congratulated.

The media must stop serving as a haven for athletes who commit social crimes. Drug abuse is wrong not only for the average American, but for the American athletes as well.

Football drops opener, 31-11

Villanova began its 1988 football season last Saturday when the Wake Forest Demon Deacons came to town. This game not only marked the first game of the season for Villanova, it represented the apparent progress that the program has made since it was reinstated in 1985. Wake Forest was the first Division 1 opponent that the Cats have played since then.

Wake Forest beat the Wildcats convincingly by the score of 31-11, but all was not bad according to Head Coach Andy Talley. "This was a tremendous game for our program. The kids worked real hard. I don't regret scheduling this game at all."

Villanova put themselves in a hole early as they did against Holy Cross in last season's finale.

Following a good return of the opening kickoff by Ron Sency, the Cats took possession on their own 39. After failing to convert a third-and-one play, Coach Talley elected to punt rather than go for the first down.

Wake Forest proceeded to march down the field in a well-controlled drive that was capped by a 30-yard field goal by Wilson Hoyle. The Wildcats, however, had to feel lucky that it was only a field goal and not a touchdown.

'Nova had another chance, but could not muster a first down. A.J. Greene then made an excellent return of the Perry Hodge punt to give the Demon Deacons great field position at the Villanova 43-yard line.

Mike Elkins, Wake's standout quarterback, led the Deacons on an impressive touchdown drive that was completed by a 16-yard run by Tony Rogers. The drive consisted of only five plays and took 1:22. With nine minutes gone, the Cats found themselves already trailing 10-0.

Then, on the last play of the quarter, things got worse for the Cats as Kirk Shulz threw the first of his four interceptions giving Wake Forest the ball deep in Villanova territory.

The Deacons punched it in the end zone shortly thereafter with five consecutive running plays. Elkins scored on a three-yard bootleg around the right end to make it 17-0 in favor of the Wake.

Wake Forest went on to score twice more in that disastrous second quarter for the Cats. Trailing 31-0, Tom Withka put Nova on the scoreboard with a 28-yard field goal on the last play of the first half.

Faced with a 31-3 halftime deficit, the mood definitely was not optimistic for Villanova. Wake Forest had already amassed 158 yards in rushing alone which was more than Villanova had achieved in total yards.

Villanova's star quarterback, Kirk Shulz, had been off his game from the start, throwing three interceptions and fumbling a snap. These miscues led to two Wake Forest touchdowns.

Shulz summed it up graciously when he said, "I think the biggest thing today was that we didn't execute offensively and I take a lot of that on my own shoulders."

Without a great deal to be excited about, Villanova came out and played a solid second half and nearly made a game out of it. The defense played much better and, stopped Wake Forest throughout the second half helped by outstanding play by linebacker John O'Brien.

Shulz looked much sharper as well, in leading 'Nova to their first touchdown midway through the quarter. The drive encompassed 66 yards and was capped off with a 32-yard scoring toss from Shulz to receiver Robert Brady.

'Nova converted a two-point try following the score on a Shulz to Peter Lombardi two-yard pass play. Suddenly, trailing by 20, the Cats were in position to make a run at the Deacons if they could get a break or two.

That break came on Wake Forest's very next play. Backup quarterback Greg Long made a lousy pitch to halfback Anthony Williams that resulted in a fumble.

Mike Feeley pounced on the loose ball and Villanova had a golden opportunity to climb back into the game with a first down on the Wake Forest 20.

But, it just was not meant to be for Villanova on this day. On second-and-five from the 15, Shulz threw his fourth and final interception of the game and the Cats

Cats finish second

By DOUG SCANCARELLA
Sports Editor

Disappointing is definitely an appropriate adjective that would describe the 1988 Villanova baseball team's season finale. The season as a whole, however, was anything but.

The Cats, for the second straight year, qualified for the Big East tournament. Their 16-2 conference record was not only the best mark of any 1988 Big East team, but the best record of any Big East team ever. Nova's overall record, 32-22, marked the second best season slate of any Wildcat team.

The squad collected many individual honors as well as team awards. Head Coach George Bennett was named Big East Coach of the Year, while players Bob McCreary, Rafael Novoa and Gary Scott collected All-Big East honors.

Bennett, who in his first year led the Cats to their first winning record in five years, has an 88-60-1 career record in three years with Villanova.

As for the players, McCreary hit .343 and appeared atop every Big East hitting category. Novoa, Villanova's ace, accounted for the most victories of any Big East pitcher, while teammate Scott turned in a league leading 21 RBI and a .381 batting average.

Unfortunately for the Wildcats, the Big East tournament did not go as well as the regular season.

Villanova ripped St. John's and Seton Hall in the first two games of the double elimination tournament, but fell to St. John's in the next two games as the Redmen captured the title.

Field hockey wins two

By AMY C. SPENCER

The 1988 field hockey team, a team rich with experience, started its season by notching two wins last weekend. The Cats have only six freshmen on the 22-man roster, while they sport four seniors. This depth is showing as no goals have been scored against Villanova yet this season.

Last Friday the Cats traveled to Bucknell for the opening game of the season. Villanova quickly took the lead when senior forward Sharon Seiz, assisted by sophomore Courtney Bova, scored on a long shot with 32:31 still left in the first period. The half ended with score remaining at 1-0, Villanova.

During the second period Bucknell was able to attempt more shots on goal than the Cats, but seven saves by senior goalie Mary Monahan kept any damage from being inflicted.

With 33:10 left in the game, freshman Melissa Paolantonio scored from inside the circle on an assist from Seiz. Sophomore Tory Rife then upped the score to 3-0 with 21:34 remaining. Bucknell held the Cats scoreless for the final 20 minutes, but still fell 3-0.

The Wildcats continued their winning ways on Saturday as they rolled over Kent State, 6-0. The Cats were held scoreless for the entire first period, but exploded for six goals in the second.

Seiz once again led the team by scoring three goals, two of which were unassisted, and assisting on the remaining three goals. Two goals came on successful shots by junior Jennifer Peacock, and one by sophomore Ann Dickey.

Students debate issues

By NOEL E. FALCO
News Editor

The presidential election debate among candidates Steve Ciarrocca, Sean Closkey and John Lewis was held Monday night in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center at 7:30 p.m. It was attended by approximately 150 people.

The panel of questioners was made up of Phil Brach, Student Government president, Jennifer Reidy, an assistant news editor of the Villanovan, and Michelle Veix, president of the Panhellenic Council. The moderator was Daniel Regan, Peace and Justice professor.

The format of the debate consisted of opening remarks, direct questions from the panel on issues of academic affairs, student life and external affairs, audience questions and closing statements.

Ciarrocca attended the debate attired in pink running tights with boxer short "panty lines," orange hightop sneakers, jacket, tie and baseball cap. After the debate, he said his appearance was not a personality statement nor a comment on the political system, but was his "tactic in winning." He deferred to his campaign manager before giving this answer.

The other two candidates wore jackets and ties.

Opening statements

Ciarrocca gave the first opening address, opening with the comment, "I'm a Libra, about 5 [feet]-10 [inches], 190 pounds and I like to do aerobics and my favorite food is sushi."

Academic integrity probed

By JENNIFER REIDY
Assistant News Editor

"It is increasingly clear to serious students that they are being hurt and that their degree is being cheapened by the lack of academic integrity among a segment of the Villanova community," according to a report by the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences' committee on academic integrity.

The report continues that "Fr. Ellis, the Dean [the Rev. Kail C. Ellis, O.S.A., dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences], created the committee [in May] because of an increasing sense of the need to address the problem of academic fraud ... a sense which stems from our experience in this office, from the experience of professors, and from the reports, complaints and increasing number of comments from students themselves.

"Academic fraud is thus not simply an academic matter but a moral dilemma which must be confronted by the community because of the damage it does to both the community and the individual," the report commented.

The National Association of Student Personnel Administrators, Inc. [NASPA] reports that "Informal polls indicate that as many as three-fourths of the student population on campuses today admit to some form of academic fraud.

"Cheating is accepted as a way of life. Too little is done to prevent it, and there is reluctance on the part of faculty and administrators to report it and prosecute when it occurs," it continued.

Over 1,800 freshmen enroll

By DANTE J. SCALA
News Editor

There are 1,812 freshmen enrolled in the University, according to a preliminary estimate, said Registrar David J. Smith on Monday.

The figure is not yet final, said Smith, but he estimated that it will not change more than 1 percent. The final figure should be compiled by next week after consultation with the bursar's office, he said.

Smith said the preliminary figure was used to prepare freshman schedules.

According to the preliminary figure, the University has enrolled 262 more freshmen than it originally expected, according to Student Government President Phil Brach.

Brach said Monday that the original number of freshmen expected was 1,550.

"I don't think they did it [the extra enrollment] purposely," said Brach.

In the spring, the University's budget included a plan to enroll approximately 50 more freshmen, said Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, in April.

Neville said at that time that he believed "the budget committee found it an economic necessity" to increase freshman enrollment by 50 in order to bolster endowment through the additional tuition funds from the extra students.

Neville also said in April that he was against such an addition in freshman enrollment because the additional freshmen would have to live off campus. He said that the planned increase in freshman enrollment was partially the reason he voted to reject the budget.

"The Senate had recommended a policy that all freshmen live on campus," Neville said in April.

Dobbin calls for coed dorm study

Neville asked to investigate

By SHARON A. WATERS
Assistant News Editor

University President the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., said Monday afternoon that he had requested a formal study on coeducational residence halls in response to a University Senate recommendation last semester.

In a memo to the University Senate dated Sept. 9, Dobbin wrote, "In response to this recommendation [US 8788-5-1] I have requested of Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, that he conduct a study on the efficacy and feasibility of coeducational residence halls at Villanova University, and that he provide me with a written report on the results of that study by December 1988."

At a University Senate meeting Feb. 19, Student Government President Phil Brach made a resolution to former University President the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., recommending "that the President charge the Office of Student Life to pursue further study on coeducational residence halls."

The resolution was passed by the Senate.

Driscoll never formally responded to the Senate concerning the recommendation before his retirement as University president last month.

Neville said Monday morning that the University would "have to look at the pros and cons of coed dorms" before making any decisions.

Though Neville said he felt there was "nothing inherently wrong with it [coed dormitories]," he added that there are advantages and disadvantages to them.

Dean of Students the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., said Friday, however, that the office of Student Life is in favor of coed dormitories.

Neville said the many issues involved with coed dormitories, including maintaining privacy and proper security, would have to be considered and studied first.

In reference to coed dormitories, he said that he was "not convinced it's necessary." He cited the facts that male and female students eat together in dining halls and participate in activities together. He Vicki Huber, member of Villanova's women's track team, will be making her first trip to the Olympics as a member of the U.S. women's track and field team.

It was one of those moments of which dreams are made. Villanova's Vicki Huber and Mary Slaney were matching each other stride for stride as they approached the final lap of the women's 3000-meter final at the United States Olympic Trials.

Slaney had set a rigorous early pace and had looked as if she would leave the rest of the field well behind her, but Huber made a valiant charge and drew even with her at the halfway point of the race.

However, Slaney, a dominant force in American women's track for quite some time, was not to be denied on this blistering afternoon in Indianapolis. She would eventually pull away to defeat Huber and return to the Olympics for a chance to attain that ever so elusive Olympic medal.

For Huber, though, this was a new experience. At 21, she will be making her first trip to the Olympics as a member of the United States Women's Track and Field team. She also stands as the first Villanova woman ever to compete in the Olympiad.

Huber, a senior psychology/premed major at Villanova, seems to be destined for greatness. She was the recipient of the 1988 Jumbo Elliot Award which recognized her as the nation's most outstanding female track and field collegiate athlete.

Among her many accomplishments, Vicki has won five NCAA

Changes in core curriculum a possibility for future

By KEVIN C. HEIL
Assistant News Editor

The College of Liberal Arts and Sciences has formed a core curriculum committee to undertake an intensive study of its core requirements, said Dr. Helen K. Lafferty, assistant dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences.

In addition, the University's branch of the Phi Beta Kappa honor society has formed a separate committee to examine the requirements in the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences.

The college committee

"It was the intention of the dean [the Rev. Kail C. Ellis, O.S.A.] to see that the core [requirements were] in conformity with both the philosophy of the college and the Mission Statement of the University . . . and to see where we need to make improvements [or] revisions," Lafferty explained.

The charge of the committee is to solicit information from all academic committees within the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences on matters such as core requirements and distribution of courses and make recommendations as to how the core requirements could be extended or improved, said Lafferty.

She said that if these recommendations are made in the spring of 1989, some implementation could begin as soon as the fall semester of 1990.

The committee is composed of faculty members "who are very representative of all of our areas: the humanities, the [natural] sciences, social sciences," she said.

Committee members include Lafferty, Dr. Mary E. Desmond, biology professor and committee chairperson; Dr. Michael E. Burke, director of the honors program; Dr. Emily M. Binns, religious studies professor; Dr. John Immerwahr, philosophy professor; and Dr. Deborah Kendzierski, psychology professor.

Other members are Dr. Frank P. Maloney, astronomy professor; Dr. Joseph A. McFalls, sociology professor; and Dr. Phillip Pulsiano, English professor.

The committee plans to study how other colleges handle their core curricula. It also wants to obtain faculty and student input from the University regarding their perceptions of the core program.

"All of this is bringing into focus how important it is that . . . the courses are not perceived as a mere checklist to get through . . . but that [they] do form a very important part of the learning process. The thrust is for integrity in the curriculum," Lafferty said.

Phi Beta Kappa committee

"The spur for this decision was a perception shared by enough members of the [Phi Beta Kappa] chapter that the core curriculum, as it now stands, is not serving the needs of Villanova undergraduates in 1988," said Dr. Vincent B. Sherry, English professor, chairperson of the Phi Beta Kappa committee and president of the University's Phi Beta Kappa chapter.

Sherry said the present curriculum has not had any major changes in over 20 years.

"There clearly is room for study to . . . see what is being proposed [to improve the curriculum]," Lafferty said.

"The kind of discussion that Dr. Sherry is undertaking with Phi Beta Kappa and the kind of discussion that Fr. Ellis is undertaking with [the college's committee] is exactly the kind that needs to happen in every department," she added.

Sherry said the Phi Beta Kappa committee has acted on its own initiative. There is no official relation between the committee he heads and the college's own committee, he added.

"We hope that we will be working in unofficial consort with Dean Ellis' committee. We will probably submit our recommendations to his committee for their deliberation, but we don't feel as though we [are] working as a subcommittee," said Sherry.

Dr. Helen K. Lafferty, assistant dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, said the college will undertake an intensive study of its core curriculum.

Villanova Magazine wins medal

Villanova Magazine, a 40-page publication produced by the University for its alumni, family and friends, has won a Gold Medal designation by the national educational organization CASE (Council for the Advancement and Support of Education).

The University's quarterly publication, with a circulation of 60,000, earned its recognition in the category of "Best Articles of the Year" by a judging committee of CASE at its July meeting.

The CASE committee chose an article in the May 1987 issue of Villanova Magazine titled "The Coming of Chaos," as best in college publications for the year.

It was written by science writer Robert Kanigel and dealt with a theory that attempts to predict the unpredictable and find order within disorder. The theory relates to all disciplines from astronomy to ecology, from music to mathematics. Judging took place in July 1988.

Local congressman to lecture

Rep. Curt Weldon will speak in the St. David's-Radnor Room in Connelly Center on Monday, at 4 p.m.

Weldon, a Republican, serves as representative from Pennsylvania's seventh Congressional district, which encompasses Villanova University.

Weldon's district includes a wide range of constituencies, ranging from the suburbs and industrial sections of Delaware County to an area of Philadelphia.

Weldon's speech, co-sponsored by the College Republicans and Professors for Weldon, is open to the public.

New faculty chairperson selected

Dr. Wilbur H. Baker, biology professor, is the new chairperson of the faculty council. Dr. John A. Doody, chairperson of the philosophy department, resigned as chairperson at the end of the summer and appointed Baker. The faculty council is a committee which represents the concerns of the faculty.

The council currently has a committee, under the direction of Howard H. Lurie, law professor, that is studying academic freedom within the University. The committee will focus on the incident of last spring which involved Capt. Charles D. Shields, Jr., U.S.N., commanding officer, NROTC [Naval Reserve Officer Training Corps] and Dr. Joseph H. Betz, philosophy professor. This committee expects to finish the report in about a month.

Betz claimed in April that Shields "ordered" students not to attend a lecture included as part of Betz's Ethics of War class. M.S.

Stack, Gorski discuss Blue Book changes

By MAUREEN STAPLETON
Staff Reporter

The 1988-89 Blue Book contains reworded and updated regulations within the context of the Mission Statement. This includes an elaboration of the visitation policy in which the University explicitly prohibits overt sexual behavior.

The Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, said, "Every rule is almost word for word for what we had last year. We wanted to give the reasons why they [the students] had the rules."

The expanded version of the visitation policy includes the statement, "Villanova University believes that a genuine and complete expression of love through sex requires a commitment to living and sharing of two persons in marriage. Consequently, overt sexual behavior and/or overnight visitation by a member of the opposite sex in residence halls represent flagrant violations of the visitation policy and the Code of Student Conduct."

Stack said, "We never stated that before but that's clearly something that the University believes." He later added, "We can take that stand. We know it happens . . . but we're standing in favor of values."

The enforcement of this policy is left up to the resident assistants and the roommates themselves. Last year, only a "handful" of students lost their campus residency because of violations of the visitation policy, according to Stack.

Stack said that repeated sexual encounters in rooms of residence halls show "a lack of respect for the roommate and is behavior that is quite public in nature." He later said, "If we don't say something, they [the students] would think the behavior is OK."

Stack also disagreed with the Sept. 9 editorial in the Villanovan concerning the overt sexual behavior statement and the sexual harassment policy. He said the editorial was "misleading." He emphasized that the punishment for sexual harassment, suspension, is harsher than the penalty for a violation of visitation, loss of campus residency.

The new Blue Book places an emphasis on the Mission Statement of the University. Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities, said, "We wanted to change the format. Last year was the first to include a Mission Statement . . . we tried to find an area from the Mission Statement that would apply."

Within the Blue Book, the academic environment in the community is more clearly defined than in previous years. Gorski said this was part of a "new thrust" by University President the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., for more "academic ambience on campus."

Gorski added, "The type of student here is more academically inclined than in the past . . . we need to accommodate that."

The initial emphasis of the Blue Book is also changed. In the previous handbook, the first few pages listed the administration of the University. The new Blue Book places spiritual life first. Gorski said, "We felt the emphasis on spiritual life to start out with was important."

Stack concluded that the new Blue Book "is an attempt to explain better why we have the rules we have . . . students have to realize there are certain expectations as they live in this community."

Students meet to combat racism, apartheid

Ed Sullivan, associate director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

The Student Coalition Against Apartheid and Racism [SCAAR] plans to continue its efforts to combat racial injustice in South Africa under a new name and role.

SCAAR, formerly the Villanova Anti-Apartheid Coalition, traces its roots back to 1985, when representatives from five to six student organizations concerned with apartheid and Villanova's divestment of funds in South Africa organized to inform and educate the Villanova community about this problem.

The group's efforts to gain information concerning Villanova's divestment from South Africa prompted some disclosures from former University President the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A. Driscoll said, according to the Sept. 26, 1986 issue of the Villanovan, "It is my understanding that Villanova, in its investments portfolio . . . has completely divested from South Africa."

In a meeting later that fall, Driscoll said, in contradiction with earlier statements, that the University still held investments of about $550,000 in seven companies that do business in South Africa. A source within the coalition found later that two of the companies had no connections with South Africa.

Questions were raised at that time by members of the coalition, one of whom questioned why Villanova did not publicize its divestment.

According to Ed Sullivan, associate director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education, the main point of divestment or investment is not in the money, but rather in the publicity. He suggested that it would do more good to hold a public ceremony to burn one share of stock and possibly hold a prayer service for the people of South Africa, than to quietly pull out a larger block of stock.

In addition, Sullivan said, "Students have a right to know if we are making money off of the disadvantageous situations of the blacks [in South Africa]."

"The official objective [of SCAAR] is to work toward justice in South Africa and to work to educate Villanova and the surrounding community about apartheid," said Kimberly Howse, the student coordinator for the group.

Howse said she feels that with the inauguration of University president the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., the group can start anew in its quest to obtain divestment information from the administration.

She said that the group plans to send representatives to meet with Dobbin, much the same way its predecessors did with Driscoll, but they hope to find more cooperation than with the previous administration on this topic.

In addition to its efforts to obtain information from the administration, SCAAR plans to raise awareness on the campus and in the community by various events such as showing apartheid-related movies and possibly holding a protest demonstration at a local jewelry store which sells South African coins.

The group also plans to write to congressmen. It tentatively plans to attend any public demonstrations which are held in Washington, D.C.

THE PRESIDENTIAL RACE

From Massachusetts, Dukakis enters national political arena

By DANIEL MORIARTY
Staff Reporter

Gov. Michael Stanley Dukakis, the Democratic nominee for president, has spent his career in public service in his home state of Massachusetts.

Dukakis was born on Nov. 3, 1933 in Brookline, Mass. to Greek Orthodox immigrant parents.

In high school, Dukakis earned letters in cross country, basketball and tennis, played trumpet in the band and was president of the student council. He graduated in 1951 and that same year ran the Boston Marathon, finishing 57th.

Dukakis majored in political science at Swarthmore College, located approximately eight miles from Villanova. He graduated Phi Beta Kappa with highest honors in 1955.

Upon graduation, Dukakis entered the U.S. Army. He was stationed at Munsan, South Korea, for 16 months. After returning to the United States in 1957, Dukakis attended Harvard Law School, where he graduated with honors in 1960.

While still a law student, Dukakis was elected as a town meeting member in Brookline. One year later he became chairman of the Democratic Committee in Brookline.

In 1962 Dukakis was elected to the Massachusetts House of Representatives. He served as state representative for eight years, compiling a consistently liberal voting record.

After losing a general election for governor in 1970, Dukakis practiced law with the Boston firm of Hill and Barlow and moderated a public television debate forum called "The Advocates."

Dukakis ran again for governor of Massachusetts in 1974 and won. From 1975 to 1978, the state's $500 million deficit became a $200 million surplus while its tax burden grew from 14.6 percent of personal income to 17.6 percent of personal income. State unemployment dropped from almost 12 percent to 4.3 percent. However, Massachusetts' personal income growth was 43rd in the nation during the same period.

In 1978 Dukakis lost the Democratic primary election for governor. In the years before the next gubernatorial election in 1983, Dukakis served on the faculty at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard. He directed the school's intergovernmental studies program and a program for senior executives in state and local government.

Dukakis won a chance to return to the state's highest office in 1983.

During Dukakis' administration, Massachusetts was the first state to fully divest its state pension funds from companies doing business with South Africa.

Texas senator adds moderation to Dems' ticket

Sen. Lloyd Millard Bentsen Jr. was born on Feb. 11, 1921, in Mission, Texas. He grew up along the Mexican border in southern Texas where he learned to speak English and Spanish with equal ease.

Bentsen attended the University of Texas in Austin, receiving his law degree in 1942. Upon graduation, he enlisted in the U.S. Army and later enrolled in flight school.

In 1943 Bentsen married Beryl Ann [B.A.] Longino of Lufkin, Texas, while continuing service in the military. During World War II he rose to the rank of major and was a B-24 squadron commander.

After the war, Bentsen returned to Texas and won election as an Hidalgo County judge. Two years later, in 1948, he ran and was elected to the U.S. Congress from his native region. Bentsen held this position until 1954, during which time he was taken under the wing of the prominent Texas Democrat and House Speaker Sam Rayburn.

Bentsen removed himself from the political arena in 1954 and moved to Houston where his three children, Lloyd III, Lan and Tina, were born. During his 16 years in Houston, Bentsen became president of Lincoln Consolidated, a financial holding institution. His net worth is currently estimated at more than $10 million.

Bentsen returned to public service when he defeated George Bush in the 1970 Senatorial election. He was reelected to the Senate in 1976 but was unsuccessful in his concurrent run for the presidency. Bentsen was a member of the Senate Finance Committee and the Armed Service Committee during his first term and he chaired the Joint Economic Committee in his second term.

Bentsen was again reelected to the Senate in 1982 and since then has served on the Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, the Select Committee on Intelligence and the Joint Committee on Taxation. The senator is the present chairman of the Finance Committee.

Within these committees, Bentsen works on nine subcommittes. Some of these subcommittees include the Subcommittee on National Ocean Policy Study; the Subcommittee on Foreign Commerce and Tourism, the Subcommittee on Economic Growth, Trade and Taxes and the Subcommittee on Private Retirement Plans and Oversight of the Internal Revenue Service.

Bentsen's voting record has earned him the reputation of a moderate Texan. He has voted both for and against on key issues such as aid to the Nicaraguan contras, Strategic Defense Initiative [SDI] funding and the death penalty.

In 1987 Bentsen opposed President Ronald Reagan on 50 percent of all his Senate votes. Issues on which he voted against Reagan include plant closing notification and federally funded abortions.

While Bentsen voted with the Democratic majority on 81 percent of all votes in 1987, he did support mandatory AIDS testing and nuclear explosives testing.

Young, conservative senator runs with Bush

Sen. Dan Quayle was born in Indianapolis, Ind. on Feb. 4, 1947. Now a resident of Huntington, Ind., he graduated from Huntington High School in 1965.

Quayle then received his bachelor's degree in political science from DePauw University in 1969 and earned his law degree from the Indiana University School of Law in 1974. That same year, he was admitted to practice before the Indiana Bar.

From 1969 to 1975, Quayle served in the Indiana National Guard. The circumstances surrounding his enlistment during the Vietnam War period have caused controversy during the campaign.

His specific duties included chief investigator for the Consumer Protection Division of the Indiana Attorney General's office, administrative assistant to Gov. Edgar Whitcomb and director of the Inheritance Tax Division of the Indiana Department of Revenue.

Quayle worked as associate publisher of his family's newspaper, The Huntington Herald-Press, and practiced law before his election to Congress in 1976.

Quayle is married to the former Marilyn Tucker of Indianapolis. The Quayles have three children: Tucker, 14, Benjamin, 11, and Corinne, 10.

The couple's net worth, as analyzed by the accounting firm of Price Waterhouse and Company, is $859,700.

Quayle served two terms in the U.S. House of Representatives, after defeating an eight-term incumbent Democrat in 1976. In 1980, Quayle challenged and upset three-term incumbent U.S. Senator Birch Bayh. Through his first six years in the Senate, Quayle had a cumulative voting attendance record of over 98 percent.

Quayle was reelected to the Senate by a 61 percent margin in November 1986, the largest margin ever achieved by a Hoosier candidate in a statewide race.

Throughout his Senate tenure, Quayle has served on three major committees: the Armed Services Committee, the Budget Committee and the Labor and Human Resources Committee.

Within these committees, Quayle serves on several subcommittees, which include the Armed Service Subcommittee on Conventional Forces and Alliance Defense, the Subcommittee on Strategic Forces and Nuclear Deterrence, the Subcommittee on Education, Arts and Humanities and the Subcommittee on Employment and Productivity.

Quayle's 1987 voting record indicates his avid support of President Ronald Reagan's position on key issues such as aid to the Nicaraguan contras, plant-closing notification, Strategic Defense Initiative testing and funding, federally-funded abortions and the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Robert H. Bork.

However, according to the American Conservative Union's Rating of Congress, the senator voted unfavorably on AIDS testing and deficit reduction issues.

Quayle was reelected to the Senate with 61 percent of the vote in November 1986.

College Republicans cry Qaddafi once again

By College Press Service

For at least the second year in a row, the College Republicans National Committee has sent out a wildly alarmist fundraising letter to potential donors.

For example, the letter claims Libyan leader Moammar Qaddafi has given United States campus groups $300,000 to "turn innocent young students away from their parents" and to "turn America back into the seething cauldron of disrespect and violence of the late sixties."

Concerned citizens, the letter continues, can counter Libyan-sponsored campus unrest by donating money to the College Republicans.

The letter, almost word-for-word the same plea for donations the group mailed to potential donors last year, raises new questions about the national committee's fundraising ethics and political espionage against campus critics of President Ronald Reagan.

The College Republicans' charges were built on "recent" reports by a small network of conservative students. Many of them are College Republican members who, drawing their own conclusions from newspaper stories and conservative magazines, write papers accusing others of disloyalty.

They then send the papers to the Federal Bureau of Investigation [FBI], which uses them as the reason for investigating groups that are critical of Reagan administration policies, as revealed in January.

Federal legislators and newspapers around the country roundly criticized the FBI's investigations of Reagan critics as improper when the scheme came to light in documents obtained by the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York "public interest" group.

In hearings, FBI officials testified their four-year investigation of the groups never did uncover any wrongdoing.

But College Republicans spokesperson Greg Rothman disregards the FBI's inability to verify his group's allegations.

"The information is still true," he maintained. "It hasn't changed. In fact, the situation there [in Central America] has gotten worse."

The 1987 and 1988 fundraising letters both claim leftist groups wish to "turn innocent young students away from their parents and grandparents" and disrupt American campuses to promote communism.

Ciarrocca seeks trailer park

By DIANE A. CILIONE
Staff Reporter

Student Government presidential candidate Steven Ciarrocca said he is running for president because "Buddy and I were meal checking last spring and Buddy said, 'Why don't you run for president and I'll be your vice president?'"

Ciarrocca said, "I'm the best man for the job because I have new innovative ideas and because I have a dog."

Social life is a major issue in his campaign, according to Ciarrocca. Bringing back tailgates will be a major goal, if elected, he said.

"What we need to do is sell south campus and use the revenue from the sale to either pay off the Radnor police or set up an escrow account from which we can pay any fines incurred during tailgating," said Ciarrocca.

In addition, Ciarrocca said, he would propose the addition of a wave pool or quasi-ocean to go with Sheehan Beach.

Other plans for social life at Villanova include "moving all the books in the library to the fourth floor and transforming the extra space into a multi-level dance club," he explained. Also, his administration would propose "an around-the-world party on campus using the security posts as the different countries," he said.

According to Ciarrocca, the University could solve the housing problem by converting the Morris Estates [west campus] to a trailer park. "We wouldn't have to worry about Radnor Township officials because if anyone came we could all hitch up and go shopping," he said.

"We propose, if elected, to keep the same visitation hours in effect," said Ciarrocca.

"But if you are caught in a dorm after hours by Security, then the Security guard must turn around, close his eyes, count to five and say, 'Ready or not, here I come,' while the student in question runs toward a base," said Ciarrocca.

"If you make it to base, you go free, but if the Security guard catches you, he gets to punch you in the arm five times," he said.

In the area of student life, Ciarrocca said that "I would propose to take away prices in the book store and just haggle."

The administration should be cooperated with as long as they listen to what the student body needs to say, he said.

Closkey stresses social life

By DIANE A. CILIONE
Staff Reporter

Student Government presidential candidate Sean Closkey says he is a "people person." "I'm concerned, I'm involved, and I feel a duty to change what needs to be changed," said Closkey.

"I'm very in touch with students, "I'm not just a member of groups like IFC, [Interfraternity Council] but I am always communicating and interacting," he said.

According to Closkey, Student Government needs a leader right now who can be two things. "We need a person who is willing to nurture Student Government and its new leaders. We also need a person who is strong, able to confront the administration, and tempered with a skepticism of the administration," explained Closkey.

"I can respond to the needs of the group as their leader," he said.

Closkey said the three major issues of his campaign are the expansion of social life on campus, coed dormitories and student voting in Radnor Township.

"I'd like to run a series of smaller, controlled, indoor alcoholic events on campus," said Closkey. These events could provide a needed outlet for student interaction on campus, he said.

"In the area of coed dorms, we've laid substantial groundwork. Let's solve this issue once and for all, get it into the Senate, vote, and force the administration to make a stand," said Closkey.

According to Closkey, progress has been made in Student Government's attempt to get Villanova students registered and voting in Radnor Township.

"I think this will send a powerful message to Radnor Township that we are not just physically present, but are now voting members of the township which they will have to address and cater to," explained Closkey.

The administration is sensitive to certain students' issues, commented Closkey.

"Right now, I think they are sensitive to the issue of social life," said Closkey. "It's during these times you have to go and collectively bargain and usually they are willing to listen," he added.

"Then there are times where they avoid making public stands on an issue. In those circumstances, you try to make them commit," said Closkey.

Student protest is a tool students can use to make their needs know, he said.

Lewis says he'll challenge

By DIANE A. CILIONE

Student Government presidential candidate John Lewis sees student life and tuition increases as the major issues for his presidential campaign.

Lewis is running for office because "the work of Joe Allman and Phil Brach is too important to be stopped," said Lewis.

"Three years ago the University Senate was a joke but Joe Allman and Phil Brach have brought respect and change to the Senate, and I think we have played a major role in that change," said Lewis.

"Without disrespect to my opposition," said Lewis, "I feel that the experience which I bring from the University Senate and from my third year on the [Senate] Budget Committee gives me the qualifications necessary for this office. I believe in Villanova, but I also believe there is much to be done."

Student life, the tuition issue and student activism are the important issues in the Lewis campaign. According to Lewis, coed dormitories and tailgating are the prominent student life areas of interest.

"Tailgating is a function of student life here at Villanova," said Lewis. "We need to work with the Student Life office and Dr. Neville [Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for student life] about some kind of social functions for football in the short run," he added.

Progress with the coed dormitory issue is also a priority, he said.

"The tuition issue is huge," said Lewis. "The University sees fit to spend $50,000 on an obscure think tank [the Common Heritage Institute], but they can't see fit to make the tough decisions that are involved in the budget," he explained.

"In the spring of 1987, I helped to lead a student protest of the budget and tuition increase," said Lewis.

"Until the administration does some rigorous cost-benefit analysis for some of the programs, the budget will be laden with programs that are not efficient and a waste of student dollars," he continued.

"We need activism among our students at Villanova ... Without students who are willing to challenge the administration and the institution, Student Government won't get anywhere," said Lewis.

When asked about a Student Government president's relationship to the administration, Lewis said, "It would be my job to challenge and confront the administration. I want to provide proposals, get things through the Senate, get things discussed and put the administration on the record," he said.

National News Notes

U. of Penn bans Greek use of kegs

The University of Pennsylvania has banned the use of beer kegs within fraternity and sorority houses, according to the Sept. 13 issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer.

This move was prompted by the new state law imposing tougher sanctions on underage drinkers. Under this law, a university can be held liable for furnishing alcohol to minors if underage drinking occurs on property owned or controlled by the university, Kim Morrison, vice provost for university life, told the Inquirer.

Fraternities and sororities would be able to serve wine and hard liquor to those of legal drinking age, but the ban targeted kegs because kegs made beer harder to control, said Morrison to the Inquirer.

"Alcohol has increased on campuses everywhere," said Morrison. "I don't think Penn is any different. We have been fortunate in that we haven't seen the kind of tragedies that have occurred elsewhere. But we would prefer to take preventive steps rather than be reactive," Morrison added.

Penn State to up black enrollment

The president of Pennsylvania State University recently said he would support increasing black enrollment from 3.6 percent in 1987-88 to 8 percent of its enrollment, currently 67,000, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Additionally, the school plans to add 10 or 12 tenure-track black professors to the faculty.

Increasing black enrollment presents problems, however, including the university's geographic isolation in the middle of the state and the limited number of black high school graduates in Pennsylvania.

Penn State's goals include retaining black students once they are enrolled at the campus, and improving the conditions for black students by writing letters to faculty and staff, meeting with black student leaders and posting anti-racism posters.

Tuition bill? Charge, say students

College students are finding an alternative method to pay their tuition bills through the use of credit cards, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Increased difficulty in acquiring low-interest loans has prompted students to use the credit card option.

The credit card is popular among part-time students because many banks will not give loans for less than $500, said Richard McCracken, director of financial aid at the Community College of Philadelphia.

Seminar to study tumult of 1960s

By E.H. McELDOWNEY
Staff Reporter

A new history course in the Honors program will concentrate on radical politics, the New Left and civil rights movements and the counterculture and culture of the 1960s.

The course is a seminar titled, "The 1960s: Politics and Culture," and Bob Pigeon of the history department is the professor. Pigeon was a student at Villanova from 1967 to 1971, and he was involved peripherally in student and anti-war demonstrations, including an anti-war moratorium.

He described Villanova in the late 1960s as "a place of lively political discourse, where we tried to concretize ideas into political and social change." Pigeon said he "has a very personal stake in this course."

Pigeon has invited several controversial figures from the era to lecture.

The first guest lecturer will be Julian Bond. He is scheduled to speak on Oct. 3 in an "open event." Pigeon said the entire University will be invited to hear Bond speak.

Pigeon described Bond as "a civil rights activist who received national attention when he refused to be seated in the Georgia senate." He added that "he [Bond] was a member of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee [SNCC], an important early civil rights group."

Milton Viorst, an author and journalist, who covered many of the big events in the 1960s, is slated to speak Oct. 27.

Tim Gallagher, a former student activist, is scheduled to give the final lecture of the course in December.

Pigeon said he had invited Tom Hayden to speak, but Hayden's schedule was filled. Hayden is currently an author and state legislator in California. He co-founded the Students for a Democratic Society group.

Anne Marie Ryan, a junior Honors and history major, said, "This is definitely not a fluff class. There's a lot of reading and thinking involved. The subject matter makes you reflect on the issues."

Ryan added that members of the class are getting time to go out to dinner with the guest lecturers. She said she was looking forward to being able to "meet and talk

He continued, "I just really have one thing to say. If anyone wants to question my commitment to this election, I just want everyone to know for the record ,that I'm missing "Alf" to be here tonight."

Lewis, following Ciarrocca, started his address, "Good evening, I'm John Lewis. I'm an Aries."

He went on to explain, "But I want to serve you this year as student body president. I really want to do the job and I'll tell you why: I'd like to take the opportunity we have to make a difference."

Lewis continued, explaining the length and depth of his commitment to Student Government using last year's challenge to the University Senate on the budget and the attempt the year before to set aside $400,000 for student loans as examples.

He explained, "The fight continues and that's why I'm here. To me, the election's not about personalities, it's about trying to make a difference. It's not about image or votes, but it's about results ... I may not be the most flashy candidate and I don't really have good set joke pieces here ... but I do want to serve and that's why I'm here and that's why I want to do this job."

Closkey gave his address last. He said, "Both John and I have been working for a long while with Student Government. I started out my freshman year trying to improve social life ... my sophomore year I continued. My junior year, I was part of the executive cabinet and I continued on ... all the big issues people wanted to address.

"We were pretty successful, we, the Student Government, over the last two years, until last year when we had an election, and the election turned out to be a big problem. The root of that problem was we had been working as a team, all together, all for the same purpose to prove the students' worth at Villanova, but we broke away from that. We started saying, 'Hey, this is mine, I did this and you didn't do that' and that created the biggest rift ... and that just totally went against the word teamwork," he continued.

He added that he wanted to create that teamwork. "What we are about, I think what this election is about, is who can come out now, pick up the pieces, and who has the best ability to lead the team," he said.

Closkey said in conclusion, "I think what this Student Government now needs is someone who works with you to get things done. I, Sean Closkey, am the man who will work with you."

Academic affairs

The debate then entered its second phase. Reidy started the academic affairs questioning by asking Closkey about the problem resulting from the combination of tuition increases and financial aid decreases.

Closkey advocated the creation of partial academic scholarships in the range of $500 to $1000 based solely on academic need. This, he said, would be the creation of the first academic scholarships outside of the 20 presidential scholarships annually awarded to incoming freshmen.

As to the problem of increasing Villanova's low endowment; he said the University must prevent having "frustrated students who leave Villanova very disgusted with our poor social policy." He said these students would not be encouraged to donate money toward endowment.

Brach then asked Lewis about the implementation of minuses into the grading system which was passed by the Senate two years ago.

Lewis said that when the system was discussed two years ago he was against it because it was intended to combat grade inflation. "It was thought that a wider distribution of grades would separate this grade inflation where everybody has a high grade," he said.

He added that he thought the minuses were only going to add more grading problems in the area of computers and that implementation still had to be worked out. He said that cumulative grade point averages would not be adjusted as a result.

"Anyone residing in this room right now will never have to deal with minuses," he explained, suggesting that they would not be implemented for another three years.

Veix questioned Ciarrocca as to whether an honor code would be an aid or a hindrance to Villanova's academic community.

He responded, "I think it would be an aid because, you know, I'm a pretty honest guy and you all are pretty honest people out there ... most people I don't think cheat. I think if we have one, it's not really going to change things but it will bring a lot of prestige."

Student life

Brach then began the student life round of questioning by asking Closkey what the next step was on the coed dormitory issue.

Closkey answered, with consideration that the issue is in the form of a bill presented to a committee for investigation, "I think what we have to do now is, as Student Government and within the student life committee, is collect positive data to prove once and for all that coed dorms will be a major benefit to this University."

Veix asked Lewis what he would do to keep the Greek system from being terminated as it has been at some other schools.

Lewis explained that the Greek system at Villanova works for people in a lot of cases and that he was not worried that administration would try to "knock out charters," particularly because he felt the system had a certain independence from administration financially.

"Unless there were a case where a Greek fraternity or sorority had clearly broken or violated one of the codes of the University, and as long as Greeks continue to provide a service to the community ... there's no reason why Villanova would ever want to change that," he said.

He added that if the situation changed, he would fight "very hard" as he has done in other cases for students.

Reidy then asked Ciarrocca what he would do as president to increase the diversity of the student body and to change the perception of Villanova as "elitist" and "homogenous."

Ciarrocca responded, "I don't think everyone's the same. As student body president, I would be sort of a figurehead. I think of myself as an unusual guy and I think it would attract other people like me."

External affairs

Veix then opened the external affairs portion of the debate by asking Closkey what he would do about restrictive housing ordinances faced by off-campus students.

Closkey replied that the first step was to get students out voting in the township for officials "who respect our rights." A second, shorter-range step, he said, is to continue with the Town and Gown Committee, a group composed of township and University members.

Reidy asked Lewis who was at fault in the relations between Radnor Township and the University, the off-campus students or the township residents, and how he would work to improve relations.

He answered that there are two problems, the minority of students who do cause problems and the majority of residents who do not want students. He also said that Radnor Township has created a bind for Villanova: its residents do not want students in their neighborhoods but they will not give the zoning to build new dormitories to house these students.

He said he did not want to blame the outside community "because there are students who do things that are not in keeping with the social conscience of the community." He added, "The only way we can get anywhere is to cooperate."

Lewis said that students' rights have been violated and that the housing laws are "unconstitutional," having been struck down in New Jersey courts. He said that constitutional rights "cut both ways."

"If the community thinks they can stamp on us, they've got another thing coming. I'm willing to compromise, I'm willing to work, but I'm not going to let us be trampled on. We have as many rights ... as anybody else who lives in the area," he asserted.

Brach was then supposed to question Ciarrocca in the area of external affairs. Instead he told Ciarrocca, "Well, Steve, to be honest with you, external affairs was a big part of my presidency. I've had three years working with Student Government in that area and I really frankly have begun to find your campaign to be questionable and I take your candidacy as an insult to my work and I cannot think of a question worthy to ask you."

Open questions

A round of open questions by the panel followed. In this round, Veix began by questioning Closkey on alternatives to tailgating.

He explained that alternatives have already been sought by the approval of such events as Casino Night, which would have alcohol in a controlled situation. He suggested that similar events with themes be developed. He also pointed out that the abolition of tailgating might give greater leverage in getting an on-campus bar.

Reidy then asked Lewis how he would rally to his causes a student body that has been called "apathetic."

He said in response that he did not consider Villanova to be a "social hotbed of change," but that the students were not apathetic. He said he would like to replace the whole concept of apathy with the concept of change and that students need to fight and take a stand.

Brach asked Lewis about his opinion of athletics in general.

Lewis said he would like to see greater student support and that he was open to the concept of inclusion of basketball and football tickets within the "student fee."

Regan then offered Ciarrocca the chance to comment on external affairs, since Brach did not ask him a question.

Ciarrocca did not comment on external affairs, but said instead, "I just want to say something ... yeah, I'm sure it looks like a lot of my fraternity brothers are here ... I get up, I say something stupid and they laugh, but everyone's listening to what these guys [Closkey and Lewis] say ... I know a lot of my friends ... have gotten a little more involved with the election since I'm doing a 'satire,' not a joke, on the election."

Audience questions

Questions from the audience followed. A moment of controversy arose when Lewis said he had not given up on tailgating. He said that both Temple University and Penn State University had held tailgates the previous weekend and that no problems resulted legally. He suggested that Villanova discontinued tailgating not so much because of the law, but because Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, and Robert Martin, legal advisor, did not like tailgating.

Lewis said he had talked to Neville earlier that day about passing tailgating as a bill through the University Senate. Lewis said the interpretation of the new law was only one legal opinion by one lawyer. He also said tailgating is not over if students are 21 years old. He suggested that these students tailgate with alumni.

Later, Lewis was called upon to defend himself as using the promise of the return of tailgating as a platform. Lewis denied it as a platform or a promise and said his question was only legal interpretation. He asked if other Pennsylvania schools can do it, "why can't we?"

In a later interview, Lewis was asked to respond to a recent article in the Philadelphia Inquirer that reports the banning of kegs at fraternity and sorority functions at the University of Pennsylvania. Lewis said this article has no effect on what he said at the debate concerning tailgating at other Pennsylvania schools.

He did add, however, that he agreed with the proposal suggested last semester to discontinue the use of kegs at tailgates. He said another option to further monitor tailgates is to obtain a license to sell beer to those of age and thus the University would cover its liability.

He reiterated, "I can't promise to get you tailgating back, but I can promise to give you a fight."

Closkey responded to Lewis' debate comments that Villanova cannot host tailgates because it is financially unable to cover the liability.

Another conflict between Lewis and Closkey arose over the question of the enrollment of about more than 250 freshmen than originally expected. Lewis claimed the tuition money paid by these freshmen will be a surplus since it was not targeted as part of the original budget. He suggested that all full-time students might get this money back in the form of a rebate since it was not needed to operate the University.

Closkey disagreed, citing one of his finance classes in which this problem was discussed. He claimed the University intentionally overaccepted for what is called a "capital budget," that the extra money was needed. He said there is "no way" students will "see that money back," but that what students have to say is "Let's not have this happen again."

Lewis rebutted, saying that at the Senate meeting in the spring, only 1,550 freshmen were to be accepted, but that he had received a count of 1,806 from the registrar's office that day. He asserted that everything he had said was documented and true.

Closkey replied to this that his finance professor could not be wrong.

Closing statements

The candidates then closed the debate with final addresses.

Ciarrocca told one final questioner, a freshman who asked him to be honest about his qualities to serve and to tell what he could do for him [the student], "As far as your personal interests, I really don't know you, so I can't say ... I've said what I had to say." His answer doubled as his closing statement.

Lewis said he wants to continue the pursuit to challenge the administration. He added, "I didn't expect the debate to get this heated. We want to work as a team. We want to get some results and keep fighting."

Closkey concluded, "We must work together, regardless of what we do. This will be a transition presidency. We can work on issues, but we're not going to see results ... [let's make this] a University for the students, not a University students just attend."

Committee to study academic integrity

tee, which mainly consists of faculty, is currently designing a proposed policy on cheating and academic dishonesty that may be implemented in the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences.

The Rev. Arthur Chappell, O.S.A., assistant to the dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences and committee member, explained that the committee's objectives are "to first create a rationale for the project, then to prepare specific definitions for terms such as 'cheating' and 'plagiarism.'

"Next we will devise penalties for such offenses, and finally we must construct some sort of hearing process," he concluded.

Chappell described the possible hearing process as "perhaps University-wide, with most probably Fr. Gallen [the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs] in charge of it. It would probably consist of a number of committees, composed of faculty, students and administrators."

He said the current policy and penalties for student cheating are unsatisfactory. According to the Blue Book, "Dishonesty in any assignment, test of examination is punishable by the grade of F and is to be reported, through the dean, to the vice president for Academic Affairs. A second offense will result in the dismissal of the student from Villanova University."

Chappel said that such a punishment is "not sufficient."

He stressed that the committee's proposal is not an honor code,

The Rev. Arthur Chappell, O.S.A., assistant to the dean of the college of Liberal Arts and Sciences, is a member of a committee to develop new policies concerning student cheating.

and that it contains a "positive concept, and does not only address cheating." He cited the committee's report, which states that "academic integrity is a concept which is at the heart of the academic life and at the heart of the life of a school which is striving for excellence in both the academic and the Christian life.

"I am continually amazed by the quality of Villanova students. I hope that this will become a topic of discussion, and I think we may see some tough ideas coming from the students," he added.

The committee seeks to define the terms cheating, fabrication, plagiarism, multiple submission, examination by proxy, facilitating academic dishonesty, abuse of electronic media [computers] and abuse of academic materials, according to Chappell.

Chappell emphasized involving faculty members in the committee's process. "If many professors feel the policy we create is too tough on students, then we may find that they won't report acts of academic fraud. We must involve the faculty in our studies and decision process so they may help us develop a program which is flexible to each particular situation," he explained.

The NASPA recommends several ways to protect academic integrity on a college campus. "Whenever possible, academic administrators should endeavor to avoid large, anonymous, lecture-style classes in which it is virtually impossible for faculty members to know and interact with students. Research indicates that academic dishonesty is far less likely to occur in small classes where there is a significant, positive relationship between students and teachers," it reported.

The NASPA also suggests that faculty members "develop course objectives and tie all tests and assignments to those objectives. Unrealistic, trite or irrelevant assignments provide students with a rationale to be dishonest.

"Courses in which there is only one examination or paper put excessive pressure on students to perform. This type of 'all or nothing' environment breeds academic dishonesty," according to the NASPA.

Chappell said that the committee has studied other universities' academic dishonesty procedures as models for devising a policy, including Colgate University, the University of Colorado, the University of Illinois, Indiana University, the University of Maryland and the University of North Carolina at Charlotte. He said that the committee has also corresponded with Notre Dame University, Georgetown University, Holy Cross University and Boston College about this issue.

Core curriculum

The members of the Phi Beta Kappa committee include Burke, Dr. Fredrick Hartman, Dr. Robert Styer and Dr. Steven Amgott, mathematical science professors; Dr. Brian J. Jones, sociology professor; and Dr. John Cavadini, religious studies professor. David Hinkle and Beth Westerman, student members of Phi Beta Kappa, are also on the committee.

Sherry said he hopes to submit recommendations to the University's chapter for approval in the winter and to prepare a final draft by the end of the academic year.

"We're going to engage in a fairly intense scrutiny and criticism of the core as it is now implemented," he said.

"We are not challenging the philosophy of a core curriculum. We hold to the belief that a student [in the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences] must have an acquaintance with a number of disciplines, he added.

Sherry said the committee is considering "clustering" courses into groups of three. A given historical field or theme would be approached from different disciplines within the college in an interdisciplinary method.

He has also proposed the idea of diversifying introductory courses by including different introductory levels.

"The committee has agreed that we can no longer assume that the whole college population is going to be serviced by one course," he said.

Lafferty agreed that there is room to pursue study and "reformulate our description of what constitutes an introductory level course."

Lafferty added, "The study that will come out [of the two committees] will serve as an excellent base for recommendations on improving the core ... from a standpoint of how our students can maximize what the purpose of the core is all about."

"We hope that between us [the two committees] some real changes will be affected," Sherry added.

Coed dorm study

added it was left to individual students to decide how much coed interaction they choose.

Neville commented, "The only place where students are isolated socially is in St. Mary's [Hall]."

He also considered the visitation policy in the dormitories as "fairly generous, fairly liberal."

Neville said the University would never make all the dormitories coed, but added, "should we offer the option of a coed dorm someplace... that's what we have to explore."

Neville called a study on coed dormitories conducted by Student Government last year "not very conclusive."

The study, which generated a 29-page report, received opinions from colleges and universities with coed dormitories and randomly surveyed students, parents and alumni.

The report stated in its final analysis that "based on the information gathered, the Student Government believes that coed dorms would be a substantial improvement to Villanova's campus. We do not deny, however, that several issues must first be addressed."

According to Stack, the easiest residence halls to convert to coed residence halls would be those with distinct separate wings, such as Good Counsel Hall, St. Monica Hall or Katherine Hall.

Stack, however, considered St. Mary Hall the best residence hall for an initial experiment of coed dormitories, in order to "make St. Mary's more desirable," although the layout of the building may not facilitate a conversion to a coed residence hall.

Stack estimated that a final decision approving a coed residence hall would have to be passed by Jan. 15, 1989, in order for the Office of Residence Life to be able to implement the arrangement for fall 1989.

Freshman Orientation

Nothing could have prepared me for the first few moments with my roommate. "Anique"—nothing more, just "Anique"—was her name. Change the "A" to a "U" and you've got a description.

When they asked what type of roommate I wanted, I didn't know that I needed to be more specific than non-smoker. I could swear I saw a picture of Anique on a postcard I got from London. Within five minutes, I found out that she was an Art History student, into the Psychedelic Furs, and totally, totally against the domestication of animals.

I was just about ready to put in for a room transfer when she reached into her leather backpack, pulled out a can of Suisse Mocha and offered me a cup. Okay, I decided I'd keep an open mind.

As we sipped our cups, I found out that Anique and I share the same fondness for Cary Grant movies, the same disdain for wine coolers, and the same ex-boyfriend. That gave us plenty to talk about.

Further evaluations of PEC delay program's inclusion

By JULIE DEL VISCIO
Staff Reporter

The women's studies program is not yet a concentration in the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences despite its recommended acceptance by the college's curriculum committee, said Dr. Barbara Wall, O.P., philosophy professor.

University evaluations of the Program Evaluation Committee [PEC] report's recommendations are causing the delay, added Wall.

The Administrative Policy committee [APC], consisting of University President the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., and vice presidents, deans and other administrators, is currently studying the PEC recommendations, according to the Rev. Kail C. Ellis, O.S.A., dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences.

PEC Recommendation 155, which the committee has not yet studied, suggests "creation of a broad-based University committee that would report to the academic vice president and would recommend policy guidelines and procedures for the creation and ongoing evaluation of interdisciplinary programs and institutes at Villanova," said the PEC report.

It is this committee which would determine whether to change the status of the women's studies program, currently an interdisciplinary program in the University College, into a full-time concentration.

Ellis said, "There is a great reluctance now to put something new in without going through all of these recommendations." The women's studies program proposal will remain in limbo at least until the APC studies and decides upon Recommendation 155, said Ellis.

Dr. Barbara Wall, O.P., philosophy professor.

The women's studies program began about eight to 10 years ago as an informal cross-disciplinary course grouping, said June Lytel-Murphy, English professor. It included courses in psychology, philosophy, religious studies, sociology and English.

Lytel-Murphy and Dr. Angelo Armenti, University College dean, instrumental figures in the development of this program, helped to get it initiated through the University College.

Six years ago, at Armenti's request, Lytel-Murphy changed the program to make it more cohesive and include more courses. Today, the women's studies faculty advisory committee and its coordinator direct the program, according to Lytel-Murphy.

Lytel-Murphy said that as a certification program, it has five required courses, including Sex Roles and Sexuality, Women in Literature, Religion and Women, and the Philosophy of Women, as well as an additional group of elective courses.

On the issue of admitting the program into the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, Lytel-Murphy said, "My own feeling is that the topic of women's studies is, for some people, problematic in the sense that there are those who feel that it is not a valid academic study.

"I personally feel very strongly that in [a] University environment that women's issues in terms of literature, philosophy, any of the areas, are important because women constitute so much of the population and because all of us are going to have to live, work and function with each other. It is valid academically ... it is valid as an exchange of ideas and I think that the time is more than passed that it should be part of the program," Lytel-Murphy continued.

Ellis said that the APC is supposed to take some action on all of the PEC recommendations by the end of September. This may prove to be positive action for the women's studies program.

Ellis said, "We are interested in women's studies. We think it is an important program and we'll see what we can do about it."

Tuition still a "good buy"

By College Press Service

Regardless of what critics say, public campuses have done a very good job keeping their costs down and their operations efficient, a survey of school's spending habits asserted.

They have done it, moreover, even as states gave them less money to spend, concluded Research Associates of Washington, which did the survey.

Consequently, public campuses remain "a wonderful buy," said Kent Halstead, a former U.S. Department of Education staffer who did the research.

"Tuition," he added, "makes up such a small percentage of the actual cost of [educating a student] — around 20 percent — that even though it's going up faster than other services, it's still a wonderful buy."

And it is going up quickly. On Aug. 7, the College Board announced average annual tuition and fees at two-year public colleges would hit $767 this year, up 4 percent from 1987-88. Students at four-year public campuses will pay an average of $1,566 to attend classes in 1988-89, up 5 percent from last year's $1,485.

By contrast, the general inflation rate in the U.S. was less than 4 percent.

Private school tuitions are rising even faster. Two-year private campus students will pay 4 percent more — or an average of $4,584 — this year, while 4-year private campus tuition will hit $7,093, up 9 percent from 1987-88.

Yet Halstead cautioned students to consider it a bargain.

Social planners look for diversity

By KRISTEN FALLAN
Staff Reporter

Campus social activities for the school year are carefully planned to appeal to the diverse interests of both on- and off-campus students, said Jeanne M. Maguire, assistant program director for the Student Union.

Maguire said the activities planned are "targeted toward what all would like."

Director of Student Activities Lucyna J. Gorski said she sees that the activities, which are programmed by the students, are "planned well and correctly ... with hopes to appeal to everybody."

Upcoming events include a bus trip to Baltimore's Inner Harbor, the entertainment of The Four Tops and The Spinners during Parents' Weekend, professional and amateur entertainment on Tuesday evenings "Live at the [Belle Air] Terrace," a film series, ballroom and Latin dance lessons and dance nights in the "Cat's Den," a campus nightclub.

In addition, two or three major concerts are now in developmental stages.

Maguire said she thinks that off-campus students are "more likely to [get involved with campus activities] right after classes. She said events such as "Live at the Terrace" should therefore be rather successful.

Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities, said she hopes the social activities planned for this year will "appeal to everybody."

Gorski hopes the off-campus students will be attracted to the dance nights and concerts.

Gorski, who said these programs cannot appeal to all, said she is open to suggestions.

The fact that the social on-campus activities are non-alcoholic functions is another consideration when planning student activities. Maguire said, "We work hard at our programs to make them interesting, knowing not all will be interested, being there is no alcohol."

Gorski said she would like to see students attracted to campus "two weekends out of the month" for campus events.

Students can get credit without class hours

By G.J. DONNELLY
Staff Reporter

The credit-by-examination program was reintroduced last week by the administration under the direction of Dr. A.J. Dorley, Jr., director of student internships.

Although the program has been available to students since 1972, this year marks its first full implementation.

"I was invited to implement [the program] on a University-wide level," Dorley said.

According to Dorley, the program will be available each semester, from the start of September to Oct. 14 in the fall and tentatively from the start of February until mid-March. The exam date for this semester will be Oct. 29 at 8:30 a.m.

The program is open to every student, regardless of grade point average [GPA]. However, no student on probation or suspension will be eligible.

The fee for the exam is $35 per credit. To apply for such an exam, the student must attain the approval of the director, the department chairperson of whatever subject he is taking and the dean of the college he is attending.

For instance, if a student in the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences wishes to take the Literature and Composition I exam, he must obtain the approval of Dorley, the English department chairperson and the dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences.

In the course of gaining this approval, the student's academic status is assessed and aid in completing the application is given. The exam and course syllabus is developed by whichever instructor is chosen by the department chairperson. The content of the course is determined by that instructor.

Students who pass the exam receive a "P" grade, which does not affect the student's GPA.

If a student fails, the failing grade will not count against him.

"The exam," said Dorley, "is comparable to the sum total of exams in a semester course. The time allocated is about five to six hours, though the average time of completion is about four hours."

If a student fails the exam, he has the right to review it with the instructor in question. That right is terminated at the end of the semester. Similarly, if a student fails to show up for the exam there will be no makeup and the registration fee will be forfeited.

During the week before the exam, the department chairperson will meet with the director and leave a copy of the exam for each candidate in a sealed envelope labeled with the student's name, Social Security number, department and course.

The notification of the students as to the time and location of the exam and any other noteworthy information is the responsibility of the director.

The instructor responsible for grading the exam has three days to do so and submit a grade report through the chairperson to the director. The notification of grades is also the responsibility of the director, who informs the student's dean, the student's department chairperson and the Registrar's office of the results.

Students may take as many exams per semester as they wish but, as Dorley said, the amount of work involved in taking such an exam, would make taking more than two "impossible."

Departments offering the credit-by-examination program are biology, classical studies, computer science, criminal justice, English, history, mathematical sciences, modern language, philosophy, physics, political science, psychology, sociology and theatre. For more information, contact Dorley at Room 101, Corr Hall.

Graduation events undecided

By BARBARA KRESCH

Christine Lysionek, assistant to the dean of students.

The 1989 graduation ceremony will either be unified or divided in four ways by college, said Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life recently.

A few weeks after the graduation in May, the graduation planning committee met to reevaluate the ceremony. Representatives from all aspects of graduation planning were there, including two students, Vicki DiStefano and Michelle Ciccolo, who were presenting a proposal for a unified graduation.

"Everyone theoretically liked the one graduation. It is a time when everyone comes together as a university," said Neville.

Christine Lysionek, assistant to the dean of students, said that the major problem with the unified graduation is the possibility of rain. She said there are no adequate ways of holding the graduation indoors.

Also, there would not be enough parking if the rugby field was too wet to be used. The shortage would cause traffic backup, said Lysionek.

DiStefano proposed an alternate rain plan, under which two indoor ceremonies would take place if necessary.

Neville said, "You cannot have that flexibility with 10,000 people." He added that the graduation probably would be called off in case of heavy rains if the unified graduation is planned.

If the graduation is divided into four separate ceremonies, the ceremonies will take place in the duPont Pavilion over a two-day period.

Repeating last year's organization of two ceremonies is not an option, according to Neville, because the ceremonies in the duPont Pavilion were too crowded.

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, should decide between having one or four ceremonies within the next two weeks, said Neville.

Student Government awaits election of new president

By STEVEN MONTRESOR
Staff Reporter

As a result of the new fall term, several Student Government members are resigning or changing positions. Many of these changes and resignations are, however, tentative due to the Student Government presidential election which is scheduled to take place Tuesday.

Kristin Switala and Mark Holobetz have moved on to new positions as advisors to the Board of Trustees. Switala, former assistant secretary of Student Government's department of academic affairs, and Holobetz, former secretary of the department, have both accepted new jobs on the academic advisory board to the Board of Trustees.

The academic affairs department is, according to Holobetz, one of four Student Government cabinets. Its function is to check for unfair academic policies, to institute new ones and to modify old ones. The academic affairs department deals with issues of an academic nature relevant to the student body, he said.

The academic advisory board to the Board of Trustees meets four times a year and discusses academic policy. Holobetz added that he and Switala can make presentations to the board and that the academic advisory board is the "student voice" to the Board of Trustees.

"Mark and myself are very satisfied with our successes last year in the academic affairs department. Our members were some of Villanova University's finest students, who will continue our work in Student Government. As for Mark and myself, it is time to move on to the Board of Trustees," said Switala.

Holobetz said that one of the main reasons he and Switala did not attempt a second term was that the job required an enormous amount of time.

In addition, Laura Stevens has been appointed the new secretary of the academic affairs department by Phil Brach, Student Government president, and she has chosen Barbara Kresch as her assistant.

There has also been some controversy surrounding the election of Jonathan Zahm to the office of University College student senator.

According to University policy, Zahm does not have enough technical credits to be elected into office although he is a junior, said Brach. This problem results from the fact that he is a transfer student. However, the Senate is attempting to have that rule altered, said Brach.

NROTC gains new instructors, midshipmen

NROTC Press Release

Compiled by Roger McCurdy II

The Naval Reserve Officer Training Corps [NROTC] unit has received two new instructors, as well as two midshipmen who are at Villanova in order to gain degrees through the Enlisted Commissioning Program [ECP].

The two new instructors will assume the duties of freshmen advisors and naval science instructors for the incoming class of 75 midshipmen.

Lt. Holly Graf was raised in Simsbury, Conn. She graduated from Simsbury High School and the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md.

After commissioning from the Naval Academy in May 1985, she attended Surface Warfare Division Officer School in Newport, R.I., for specialized training in shiphandling and shipboard operations.

Upon graduation in October 1985, she reported to the U.S.S. Puget Sound in Norfolk, Va., where she held division officer billets in repair, engineering and deck departments and received the surface warfare designation.

In May 1988 she reported to the U.S.S. San Diego, deployed to the Mediterranean, before assuming the instructor post at Villanova.

Lt. James Fox was raised in King of Prussia, Pa., graduated from Upper Merion Area High School and Villanova University.

After commissioning as a surface warfare officer in May 1984, he attended both the surface warfare division officer and communications officer [afloat] courses of instruction in Newport, R.I. Upon graduation he reported to the U.S.S. Thorn. While assigned to the U.S.S. Thorn he held division officer billets as the communications, fire control and gunnery officer, and received the surface warfare designation. In April Fox returned to the NROTC unit at Villanova as an instructor.

Officer candidates

The Navy offers outstanding sailors, who are highly motivated for a college degree and a Naval commission, the chance to realize their goals though ECP. Participants in the program have earned 60 college credits through off-duty study prior to reporting full-time to an NROTC host university to complete their degrees. Two recently-arrived officer candidates are the first ECP participants at Villanova.

Officer Candidate Steven J. Tripp was raised in Longmeadow, Mass., graduated from Longmeadow High School and attended the University of Massachusetts in Amherst, Mass.

After joining the Navy in August 1981, he served a brief tour onboard the U.S.S. John F. Kennedy. Tripp then attended anti-submarine warfare training in Memphis, Tenn., and Jacksonville, Fla., and also completed work at the Naval Aircrewman Candidates School in Pensacola, Fla.

He then reported aboard Patrol Squadron 26. While assigned to the squadron he flew 2,300 hours as the primary acoustic sensor operator onboard the P-3C Orion aircraft and was designated a Naval aircrewman.

His collateral duties included assignments as the acoustic NATOPS evaluator and leading petty officer of the squadron's tactics and anti-submarine warfare divisions.

In May 1988 Tripp was selected for ECP and attended the Naval Science Institute in Newport, R.I., enroute to the NROTC unit at Villanova.

Officer Candidate James Edwards was raised in Florissand, Mo., and Encinitas, Calif. He obtained a high school equivalency certificate from the state of California.

After graduating boot camp in December 1979, he attended Aviation Anti-submarine Warfare Operator Class "A" School, NAS Memphis; Naval Aircrew Candidate School, NAS Pensacola; and Acoustic Operator School for P-3C Update Aircraft, NAS Moffett Field. Upon completion of his training he reported to Patrol Squadron 46.

While attached to the squadron he held billets as primary acoustic NATOPS evaluator, tactics office leading petty officer and triple vernier training instructor. He also was a personnel qualification standardization qualifier and qualified as a Naval aircrewman at the primary acoustic station onboard the P-3C (U) aircraft.

While temporarily assigned to Commander Patrol Wing 10, he was the acoustic target software analyst and qualified as an assistant debriefing officer. During his tour with the squadron Edwards deployed to Okinawa, Japan, and Miswa, Japan, accumulating over 2,500 flight hours.

In July 1985 Edwards transferred to the Naval Air Development Center at Warminster, Pa., where he continued to hold the billet of primary acoustic NATOPS evaluator and also fleet software support leading petty officer and acoustic software liaison for the Navy's P-3 Update IV avionics program.

Edwards was accepted into the ECP in January and is currently attending Villanova.

Pigeon remembered the 1960s as a time when "people were more conscious of larger ideological issues." But he added that he is not teaching for nostalgic reasons.

He said that he was approached about teaching the course after his involvement in the protest of former Attorney General Edwin Meese's on-campus speech last year. He said he was looking to raise real and important issues of social justice again.

Pigeon said he thought the course might run every other year in the future.

He concluded by commenting on the student of the 1990s. "I have seen a growing dissatisfaction among students with the mainstream political system. At the same time I've seen a hunger for ways [for students] to express their dissatisfaction and in ways to make a change."

John Lewis for president

Both Sean Closkey and John Lewis have proved themselves confident, capable and experienced candidates for the job of Student Government president. Closkey demonstrated himself to be an innovator over the past few years, especially in his efforts concerning student life and the founding of the Student Activities on Campus Committee [SACC]. Moreover, as assistant secretary of Internal Affairs, Closkey was deeply involved with the Student Government drive for coed dorms. Closkey was extremely impressive at the presidential debate Monday night, and more than held his own against Lewis, who is reputed for his eloquence.

Closkey has described himself as a realist, the ideas he expounds are practical. In fact, it was his realism that drew our support of him in last year's election. However, next to Lewis, his consistently realistic outlook makes him look unambitious. Lewis has proved time and time again to be thoroughly knowledgeable of the issues that most concern the students, especially tuition increases and the budget process. He gained this expertise as a member of the University Senate Budget Committee for three years.

A particular aspect that distinguishes him from Closkey is his vast Senate experience, and this is especially important since the Senate is one of the few and certainly most effective means in which the students may attempt to voice their opinion to the hierarchy of the University.

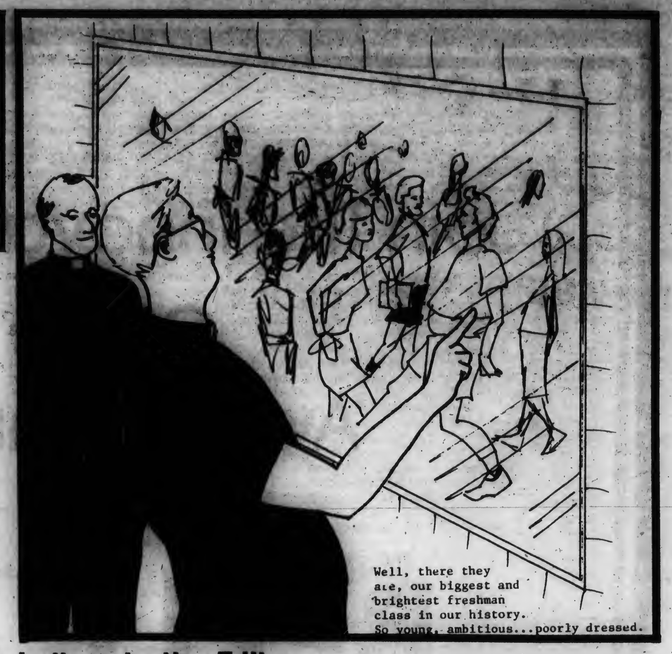
Anyone who attended last year's protest at the Senate meeting to vote on the 1988-89 budget was inspired by Lewis and Phil Brach's well-prepared and almost passionately driven attempt to block a seemingly inevitable "pass" vote from the Senate. However, the final vote was counted as 17-16, and if it were not for the absence of two student senators, the budget might have failed. The appearance of over 200 students at the meeting amazed all of us who felt Villanova students were apathetic. Lewis was instrumental in this protest. The only other trace of protest we have detected on this campus concerned the arrival of former Attorney General Edwin Meese to Villanova, and again, Lewis was a key in organizing and staging that protest.

Lewis and Closkey have both revealed themselves to be extremely qualified for the job of Student Government president. However, the true question we must ask is, which of them is a better leader? The answer appears to be Lewis, for he has proven this fact.

We would also hope that Lewis has the good reason to involve Closkey in his administration, perhaps even as vice president. In this way, Closkey can better concentrate on his goals for student life and coed dorms. Moreover, because this presidential term is relatively short, it will be primarily transitory. Due to these time constraints, coed dorms may be the only issue that sees any concrete progress, and Closkey is the individual to lead and drive this effort.

Meanwhile, Lewis has created some incredible challenges for himself, including the restoration of tailgating and the possibility of the tuition rebate for the student body. These issues seem almost impossible to achieve, but Lewis presented some convincing arguments for their success at the debate. We will be interested to observe these outcomes.

But most importantly, we believe that a Lewis-Closkey administration can effectively continue the work that Phil Brach and Joe Allman have begun.



Well, there they are, our biggest and brightest freshman class in our history. So young, ambitious...poorly dressed.

Letters to the Editor

Fraternity poster sexist

To the Editors:

It saddens me to write this letter. What I have encountered today is something that I thought was long destroyed; at least among the institutions of higher learning, where people pride themselves in an openness and respect for humanity.

It is fraternity rush season at Villanova. Posters and colorful handouts are plastered on the walls along with used book offerings and student job announcements.

The Pi Kappa Phi fraternity has posters out seeking interested students to join their organization. Their slogan this fall is "Pi Kappa Phi . . . Just Because."

This blatant sexist comment insinuates to incoming freshmen that fraternities who use women as sexual objects are 'cool'!

Along with their Greek letters they have included a photograph of a female gymnast. Her legs are spread further than even the most nimble of athletes have the ability to do.

This blatant sexist comment insinuates to incoming freshmen that fraternities who use women as sexual objects are 'cool'!

By ignoring a suggestion such as this, we are merely accepting that [the sickness of] sexism is beyond remedy. I feel that subtle messages like the Pi Kappa Phi recruitment poster foster the seeds of date rape and sexual harassment.

Perhaps equally disturbing as the photograph of the gymnast on the poster, is the small ink stamp in the corner which reads "Approved for Posting . . . Student Activities."

Is not the University just as guilty for allowing such a desensitised, brutal statement to be hung inside its academic buildings?

While concern for student drinking habits is undoubtedly of immediate necessity, perhaps the University should monitor its organizations, whether within the Greek system or not, to ensure that they maintain a level of respect and dignity to persons of all sex and color.

I would hope that both students, faculty and administration alike take immediate action and speak out against all further encouragement similar to that which has been displayed in this incident. Giving the official stamp of approval to the subjugation of women is unacceptable.

Guiding a coed dorm bill through the Senate

By DANTE J. SCALA

Politics is the art of the possible, it has been said. A door suddenly opens at the end of a dark hall, and the person who can walk through it without stumbling becomes a political hero.

At a time when students search for a new leader, such an opportunity has appeared.

The new University president, the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., has said he is not opposed to the idea of coed dorms. He did not say yes, but more importantly, he did not say no. In fact, he has even called on Vice President for Student Life Dr. Richard A. Neville to investigate the issue.

Furthermore, he has sent the issue into student territory — the University Senate. Dobbin endorsed that body's political process as a way to settle the issue. Work it out there, he told students, let all constituencies — faculty, administration, alumni — hammer out a plan, then bring it to me.

Students have done well in the Senate the last two years, mostly because they have done their homework: gathering the facts, presenting their argument, lobbying. Perhaps their success is due to motivation. After all, it is one of the few places where students have a permanent position in the University's decision-making process.

Another factor in Student Government's home court advantage is the support it can muster from its constituency. Almost all students — over 90 percent, by student Government's last count are interested in coed dorms.

April's protest of tuition hikes at the Senate budget meeting shows that if students feel strongly enough, they will make their feelings known. If 200 students surround the Senate meeting table again, watch the home court advantage multiply.

But getting a coed dorm proposal approved by the senate will not be easy. There are pitfalls waiting in the hallway. For instance:

"Black hole" committees. Light never escapes black holes, and issues never escape some Senate committees. The Senate created a committee to study tuition financing alternatives in April 1987. It has not yet made a report.

And then there is the security and parking policies committee, created last September, with grave anger by senators frustrated with chief Rowan Kelly's procedures. Perhaps it was hampered by limits set upon it, but it quietly slipped into obscurity when the Program Evaluation Committee report on Security emerged.

This fate does not befall all issues, and it may not happen to the coed dorm issue, especially since Dobbin has set a December deadline for report from Neville. But smart politicians do not take chances. The new Student Government president should make sure active, interested students are on the committee, so a proposal can be worked out quickly and thoroughly.

Inertia. Last year's budget proposal managed to clear the Senate despite heavy opposition partly because it had the weight of the lumbering administrative process behind it. By the time Student Government tried to stop it, it was too late.

This time, Student Government faces a body at rest. While other Catholic universities have crossed the great divide of coed dorms, Villanova has kept its feet firmly planted (students had to sit in to try to get visitation rules changed in the '70s).

The new student president will have to lead a vigorous but diplomatic lobbying effort, to persuade the University to consider new ideas.

And finally, the case of the missing student senators. Despite its successes, Student Government has shot itself in the foot in important situations. At the budget meeting in 1987, the student senators' attempts to block the budget were handicapped because some of their own were missing. Last spring, two student senators — the margin of victory in a 17-16 vote — were absent without excuse.

Indeed, there is no excuse for such student irresponsibility. The blame lies not only on the absent senators, but on past student caucus leaders. Students only constitute one-third of the Senate. They must make every vote count.

So the coed door is open. It will be up to the new Student Government president to lead his constituents through it. And remember, it always helps to have a catchy slogan. How about "no taxation without coeducation?"

Don't ridicule election process

By JENNIFER REIDY

Since the Joe Allman administration, Student Government has experienced a sort of renaissance. Allman was instrumental in revitalizing the vision and efforts of the members of Student Government, and he established the organization as a force with which to be reckoned by the administration. He accomplished this, amazingly, amidst the wreckage of the Greg Noone presidency. Those who remember Noone will remember that his greatest claim to fame was the student directory, which to add insult to injury, was late in its printing and distribution.

Since 1987, Phil Brach has continued and strengthened Student Government's rebirth in the tradition of the Allman administration.

Brach and the members of his staff have worked laborously and inspiredly on numerous issues concerning the Villanova student body. They have attacked such formidable problems as the strained relationship between surrounding townships and the University, the absence of student social life on campus, coed dorms, tuition increases coupled with diminishing financial aid resources and academic policy concerns, especially with academic dishonesty, among many others.

Because of the magnitude of these problems, members of Student Government have had to work diligently and continually, and progress often times appears very slow. Moreover, one must consider that the administration of this University is a giant bureaucracy, and any significant change is only achieved over time by persons committed to this change.

Thus, the new Student Government president that is elected on Tuesday must be a capable, competent and visionary leader who is willing to keep the machinery of Student Government moving in the right direction.

Because I recognize Student Government as the only real voice that students have in this giant bureaucracy, I realize that its leaders must be experienced in the processes of the University, be knowledgeable of special issues of student concern, and perhaps most importantly, be sincere in his or her commitment to facilitate change.

Candidate Steve Ciarrocca is none of these. His ridiculous campaign is a mockery of all the progress and respectability that Student Government has obtained over these past years.

I understand he claims his campaign to be "satirical," but I do not think he reveals any clever or intelligent insight on today's Student Government, but rather reveals his true ignorance of the University's state of affairs.

At the presidential debate Monday night, Ciarrocca revealed the depth of his ignorance as he somewhat attempted to approach the issues: he claimed that student cheating is not a problem at Villanova, he stated that there is plenty of diversity among the thoroughly white, upper-middle class student body and had absolutely nothing to say about the serious problems between the University and Radnor Township.

As John Lewis and Sean Closkey, the other two presidential candidates, argued intelligently about tailgating and the budget surplus created by extra amount of freshmen who enrolled this fall, Ciarrocca had nothing to say because he knew nothing about these issues or how to combat them.

Finally, it was made painfully obvious that Ciarrocca is all image and no substance when a freshman in the audience asked him sincerely what he planned to do as Student Government president, and what he could do for his needs as a student here. "As far as your personal interests, I really don't know you, so I can't say . . . I've said what I had to say," was Ciarrocca's reply.

If Ciarrocca's attempt at satire is to point out the nonsense of politics and campaign promises in an election, especially after last year's fiasco, his point is well taken. However, someone should tell him that the joke is getting old.

If satire is his true point, then he should have the good sense to bow out of the election before the polls are opened on Tuesday. He did have some very funny comments at the debate, such as making the Morris Estates into a trailer park, or constructing a multi-level parking garage on the Main Lot and painting it as though it were not there. However, I cannot respect someone who, although he supports the image of a rebel who hopes to stir controversy, has absolutely no depth to his candidacy. If he did have some worthwhile and innovative ideas to expound, he may have proven himself a believable candidate.

The Dark Age of Greg Noone's presidency will truly have come full circle if Ciarrocca is elected. He probably believes he can shake up this school and the administration as president, but in reality, the administration will have the last laugh as he flounders in his new position.

The true liberals of this election are Lewis and Closkey, not Ciarrocca, for they will fight for change and know how to effectively pursue it by means of their experience. A Ciarrocca presidency can only seriously stagnate Student Government, and thus, damage the needs of Villanova students.

In his personal description, Ciarrocca explains that his nickname is "Coco" because it is short for "Coconut Head." He has no argument from me.

Security praises orientation program

To the Editor:

I would like to recommend that the 1988 New Student Orientation Program, chaired by Amy Piek, be commended for an outstanding job performed beginning on Aug. 27.

The reason for this request is as follows: The committee placed signs in strategic positions to show parents and new students the way to various dorms and buildings.

They helped parents and students unload their vehicles and take luggage to their rooms. This was a great help to the parents and students, and it was also beneficial to the Security Department, as parents unloaded quickly to let others unload without being told to do so by the Security Department.

I have only been at Villanova a short while and have only been through two orientation programs, but I think that the job this year was commendable and that the committee should be told of the great job done.

Usually, the Security Department only tells the bad side of the story, but I think that the good side should be told when actions merit it.

Vote Sean Closkey

To the Editor:

Several months have gone by since the last election and now the student body will have a new president to lead them or will they?

This election seems to parallel the last election, as there is an idealistic platform and a realistic platform.

An idealistic platform sounds great but will never be a reality at this University.

What is needed is a creative, intelligent and realistic platform, which is exactly what Sean Closkey is offering.

Closkey knows how to effectively use the limited amount of time allotted to this administration and has clear goals that will make for a very worthwhile year. Make the realistic choice. Vote Sean Closkey for president Sept. 20.

Allman supports former C&F Senator

To the Editor:

Regarding the candidates for the upcoming elections for Student Government president, John Lewis is the most qualified.

Lewis was involved in Student Government in my administration and was involved again last year. John is a very hard worker and does his work efficiently.

Although Lewis has been involved, in some way, in most of the major student issues, his main concentration has been on the budget of the University and student tuition.

In these areas, his work has been superb. It is a real treat to see Lewis "battling it out" with faculty and administrators in the Senate.

Lewis has gained the respect of some of the top faculty members and administrators of the University. This is because of his performance when dealing with student issues.

The students would be wise to make the choice of John Lewis for president. I know that, as he has done in the past, he will get the job done.

Joe Allman
Former Student Government President
Class of 1987

Lewis qualified

To the Editor:

On Tuesday, Villanova students will have to decide between three very different candidates. The choice is clear, however. John Lewis brings to the race experience, commitment and integrity that his opponents cannot match.

Since coming to Villanova from Wake Forest last September, I have come to learn much about Student Government and the issues and leaders that shape policy here. Along with Phil Brach, Lewis has been at the forefront of many positive initiatives.

He was a leader in protesting the tuition increase, organizing the used book sale, and proposing a student loan program that would bring $400,000 in funding to students in need.

Lewis, however, is much more than a political negotiator. He really cares about the University and the threat Villanova faces of becoming a haven for only the richest of students.

He really cares about getting more dorms built so that upperclassmen can share in the camaraderie and excitement of dormitory life.

He really cares about registering students to vote so we can elect township politicians who recognize our zoning needs.

Knowing him personally as well as professionally (through working with him on state and national campaigns), I could not imagine a better candidate, in terms of work ethic and leadership ability, to build upon the accomplishments of past Student Government presidents Phil Brach and Joe Allman.

Jonathan Zahm
University College Senator

Improve Villanova

To The Editor:

With all the changes in administration and the strict alcohol policies, this year at Villanova can be either the best or worst of your college life.

We cannot get discouraged about the new policies, but encouraged by the fact that if we elect the right person for president, there can still be life after tailgates at Villanova.

We believe Sean Closkey has the right ideas to get life back on campus. His experience and innovative ideas, which include a casino night and spring fling, will help to enhance activity on campus.

Our spirit for Villanova is evident at the basketball games each year. Don't limit that spirit to the duPont Pavilion; bring it back to campus by voting for Sean Closkey.

He is not only a good speaker — he is an achiever.

So, stop complaining about what is not happening and make it happen by voting on Sept. 20.

Vote John Lewis

To the Editor:

John Lewis is currently running for Student Government president, and, as a former Villanova student, I felt it necessary to write in and give him a plus.

About two years ago, I had the misfortune of having to drop out of Villanova, because I could no longer afford the tuition due to the massive increases. It was always difficult trying to balance school and work at the same time.

It may be too late for me to return, but because of people like Lewis on the Senate, those who follow after me may have an easier time.

Lewis has continually fought for the ordinary guy who is trying to make his way through school. His perseverence in fighting tuition increases tooth-and-nail, as well as scanning the school budget for wasteful boondoggles, would be a great asset at the helm.

For all those concerned, please elect John B. Lewis for Student Government. He is a hard-worker, extremely intelligent, accessible and above all, has a good sense of what is necessary to the well-being of the Villanova community.

Do yourselves a favor, elect John Lewis.

Alumnus cites accomplishments

To the Editor:

I was very pleased when I received the news that John Lewis had decided to run for president of Student Government. I first met Lewis in 1986 when then Student Government president, Joe Allman appointed him to the Budget Committee of the University Senate.

Lewis excelled in that position, gaining the respect of the administration, faculty and fellow student members of that committee. He worked closely with Allman, the other student senators and myself to prepare us for the technical budget debates. The Senate at my request allowed Lewis to present and take questions on his research of the proposed tuition increases and faculty salaries.

Lewis's arguments proved to be a major factor in the compromise that led to an amended budget (which earmarked $200,000 of surplus revenues for the establishment of a student loan fund) that was unanimously approved by the Senate (which means voted for by all the administration senators, faculty senators and student senators).

This amended budget was rejected by the Board of Trustees. Consequently, the University budget of the 1987-88 school year that the Board of Trustees put into effect was one that was unanimously rejected by the University Senate.

A year later Lewis, as C&F senator in 1987-88, led the fight that fell one short of defeating the 1988-89 University budget. Again, some administrators, and many faculty members voted with students against the proposed budget. The reasons they did vote with students against the budget was because of Lewis' cogent arguments which were based on his hours of researching the budget and financial needs of the University.

Lewis cannot be dismissed as some whiner simply complaining about tuition increases. In fact, the opposite is true. Lewis is convincing many in the administration and faculty that spiraling tuition costs are not in the interest of the University.

Lewis is doing this with sound arguments based on sound data. The unprecedented votes against the proposed University budgets by non-student senators shows that his message is getting through.

This is the kind of leadership that Villanova students need from their next president; it is in the tradition of Joe Allman and Phil Brach whom Lewis has worked with closely from the very beginning.

I strongly urge all students to vote for John Lewis for president because the fight for a greater student voice should continue.

Closkey praised

To the Editor:

On Sept. 20, the Villanova community is faced with yet another difficult decision. Who do we choose as our Student Government president? In this unique election, it is particularly important to choose a candidate who is willing and able to work with the students and for the students.

Although two of the presidential hopefuls are qualified, one candidate has proven his ability to inspire and rally student support. This same candidate is a leader among his peers.

Not only can he work as a member of the Student Government team, but he is also capable of working successfully with administrators.

This candidate works hard for you because he believes in the need for continual improvement at Villanova.

This candidate cares enough to work to accomplish the little steps which eventually bring about great successes.

This candidate is patient and persistent. He is the candidate who wants to be your president. Elect Sean Closkey.

Support Lewis

To the Editor:

As a recent graduate of Villanova University, I have seen the tremendous changes that have come about due to an active Student Government.

As a recent graduate of Villanova University, I have seen the tremendous changes that have come about due to an active Student Government.

With the elections of Joe allman and Phil Brach, a Student Government has taken on the administration and the faculty in University matters, and John Lewis was there.

Leading the fight for reasonable tuition rates, John Lewis was one of three students to receive full access to the University budget. Lewis has sought to trim away needless University expenditures before placing a higher tuition burden upon the students.

As a University senator, and a member of the Budget Committee, Lewis was at his best when he led a protest of 250 students at the April Senate meeting. Reading the stories of students that could not stay at Villanova due to financial reasons and recalling our Christian Mission Statement, Lewis was inspiring.

Particularly disturbing to me was the recent news that tailgating had been permanently foresaken at Villanova. I have many fond memories of brisk fall afternoons enjoying the pre-game festivities at my Alma Mater.

Lewis, as a University senator, is the only one with the leadership and experience to help bring back this integral part of student life.

In short, I hope you will seriously consider John Lewis for Student Government president.

Lewis a leader

To the Editor:

Two years ago, when I first came to Villanova, I did not know how fortunate the school was. Only gradually did I learn the story of how Joe Allman had challenged the weak and ineffective presidency of Greg Noone, in order to reform and revitalize Student Government.

However, even during my freshman year, I could not doubt the effectiveness of the Allman administration. During Allman's tenure a new constitution for Student Government was written; a cabinet structure was implemented to deal with every aspect of student life, such as external affairs and academic affairs (to name just two).

In the Senate, a coalition of student senators were able to insure that student concerns were addressed, as when they gained the guarantee of a week-long Fall Break.

The Brach administration, characterized by diligence and determination, has worked to consolidate the victory won by Joe Allman.

During the two years of reformed Student Government, there have been victories as well as losses. What it is important to remember is that Student Government has created a viable forum to articulate the concerns of the student to the University and to the administration. In that course of time, Student Government has gained a prestige and respect that was undreamed of just three years ago.

The students cannot afford to lose the momentum of the past two years. What is needed now is a strong leader who has the ability to work for the needs of the student, just as Allman and Brach have. John Lewis is such a leader.

Lewis is experienced in the workings of Student Government; he was a member of Allman's cabinet, and last year he was a C&F senator.

He understands both the executive branch of Student Government, as well as the University Senate. He is committed.

No one who saw the time and effort he spent researching the budget for the last two years can doubt that. Thanks to him, the student senators were able to knowledgably and effectively challenge the University administration regarding the budget.

Lewis will open Student Government to more students. He has proved that he can get other students involved, as shown by his work in organizing student protests last year. Lewis knows that being president is a difficult task, but he is ready to accept the responsibility.

I urge my fellow students to vote for John Lewis as Student Government president. He has the commitment, experience and enthusiasm to continue in the tradition of excellence established by Joe Allman and Phil Brach.

Jewish holiday remembered

To the Editor:

This country has days for celebration (July 4, Labor Day) and participation (Election Day). Interestingly, the Jewish calendar lists a day for repentance, (Yom Kippur).

Throughout the U.S. history, Americans has acknowledged wrongdoing about slavery, regrets about Viet Nam and mistreatment of American Indians.

Each Yom Kippur, for thousands of years, Jewish people have realized the need for personal, as well as national, repentance. It is not only we who are Jewish, who have to turn to God in true repentance, but everyone whom God has created.

Unlike New Year's Day resolutions, Yom Kippur is not a day of self-reformation where we cleanse ourselves and then go back to our sins. Repentance has to go beyond admitting we have done wrong. If we as individuals turn to God through the Messiah, we will be forgiven truly, and as the Bible says, "Happy is that people whose God is the Lord."

Up With People on a quest for peace

By JACQUELINE GENTILE
Features Editor

Up With People is the United Way campaign kickoff event, and it is coming to Villanova University on Sept. 18 at 3 p.m. in the duPont Pavilion. The two hour performance, "Time for Music," will take you on a tour of the world and a trip through time with its musical selections.

What exactly is Up With People? Founded in the mid 1960s by J. Blanton Belk, it is an international organization that offers young men and women a year-long experience of extensive world travel, cross-cultural education, opportunities to perform diverse community service and a chance to build musical talent through on-stage performance experience.

The goal of Up With People is to build peace through understanding. According to Belk, who is also the organization's president, "Peace is not an abstract concept, it's people becoming friends. Friendships are the fabric that hold peace together in the world."

Up With People is not, however, a religious or political group, but seeks participants from all backgrounds, races and religions.

Music is the main focus for Up With People because the organization began with the belief that music can overcome barriers, bring people together and provide a means for people to share their enthusiasm and questions about life.

Each year there are 550 people, representing approximately 25 countries and making up five international casts that travel world-wide doing on-stage performances and community service. During the year the participants live with 80 to 90 host families, allowing the participants to receive firsthand information about the lifestyle of the community they are visiting.

The participants in Up With People are between the ages of 18 and 26, and also have the opportunity to gain college credit through a planned educational program. Musical talent is needed in each cast.

According to Lynne Morris, director and choreographer, "We don't treat any of the participants as amateurs and they always live up to our expectations."

Selection, however, is not based upon an audition, but a personal interview where qualities such as motivation, interest in the world around them and an ability to communicate with others are looked for in applicants.

In addition to the on-stage performances, Up With People participants do approximately four public service activities for every two-hour public performance. They give themselves personally to people in hospitals, prisons, senior citizens' homes and schools.

Up With People will bring their world-renowned rap to Villanova on Sept. 18.

Up With People has been in over 3,100 cities in a total of 48 countries. They have performed at halftimes of National Football League, Superbowls X, XIV, XVI, XX; Radio City Music Hall, New York City; The Olympic Games; Munich, Trivoli Gardens, Copenhagen. They have also appeared at the Macy's Thanksgiving Day Parade in New York City, and have been received by Pope John Paul II in Rome.

Up With People offers such a diverse experience to those who participate, that it is nearly impossible to describe it briefly. But Belk sums it up when he states, "I saw the ability of young people to do in the future what governments find it difficult to do — to walk through borders, see through races, creeds, religions and colors. What is common to all mankind, and to urge understanding among all peoples of the earth."

If you are interested in participating in Up With People, interviews will be held following the performance at duPont Pavilion. For more information contact Beth Shober at 655-2522.

Sting, "The Boss" lead rockfest for freedom

By ANNE MARIE LOMBARDI
Staff Reporter

"All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights." This is the historic promise of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, proclaimed by governments in the United Nations 40 years ago."

These lines are removed directly from the petition for the Human Rights Now! campaign sponsored by Amnesty International [A.I.]. The campaign consists of a world-wide music tour throughout the months of September and October to raise public consciousness against those nations that have violated this declaration.

Amnesty International is obtaining the signatures of thousands to be sent to the United Nations headquarters in order that governments will be pressured to "ratify the world's human right treaties, to bring their own laws and practices in line with them and to act to protect human rights everywhere."

In their appeal for signatures and public awareness, A.I. has organized a concert to be held on Sept. 19 at JFK stadium in Philadelphia, and two more U.S. dates in Los Angeles on Sept. 21 and 22. The list of performers includes Youssou N'Adour, Tracey Chapman, Peter Gabriel, Sting and Bruce Springsteen. The names of any of these singers would sell tickets and the combination of such phenomenal talents guarantees a sell-out concert.

However, unlike the Live Aid concerts or similar events, A.I.'s goal is not to raise money. In fact, A.I. will lose so much money on this campaign that Reebok has agreed to co-sponser by making up for the money lost. Why have such an event if it will only lose money?

"The goal of Amnesty International is to raise mass consciousness about the violations against the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by governments who are members of the United Nations," says Jim Gunn, president of Villanova's Amnesty International chapter.

"Although tickets in the United States are $35 apiece, in Bangledesh, tickets are about $3 because of that nation's great poverty. A pay scale is used so that concert attendance will be possible in countries not as wealthy as the U.S.," added Gunn.

For those unfamiliar with the A.I. organization, it is an international network working to defend worldwide human rights with a particular focus on the release of prisoners of conscience: those who are detained for their beliefs, race, sex, language, religion or origin. They also work to ensure fair and prompt trials for all political prisoners and to end torture and execution in all cases.

This movement was started in 1961 by lawyer Peter Benenson who initiated a one-year campaign to focus public attention on prisoners of conscience.

Since 1961, 3200 groups in 55 countries and members in more than 160 countries and territories work to handle the individual cases of 5000 prisoners a year. This organization, which is independent of all governments, political factions, idealologies, economic interests and religious creeds has freed approximately 400 prisoners a year.

Villanova's own chapter has about 15-20 active members and held their first recruitment meeting on Sept. 12. Under the Department of Peace and Justice, A.I. seeks members willing to work towards the assurance of human rights through the thousands of letters and campaigning required. A.I. volunteers will be manning booths at the concert and asking concert attendees to sign the Human Rights Now! petitions.

When asked why concerts seem to be such a popular way to reach the public, Gunn replied, "People really enjoy concerts. You can't force people to listen to the news or be aware of all the worldwide social issues. Music allows people to think about the social issue at stake and give their support without forcing it down their throats."

In the 1960s, music was the hand that reached out to the public in an attempt to explain the social changes going on in our country. Again, it is being used to bring to awareness and examine some changes that should be made in society.

Donors not at risk

It is true. There is no risk in contacting the AIDS virus by donating blood. Yet, in the past two years, the number of first time blood donors has dropped dramatically.

According to Judy Gazzara, manager of communications for the Red Cross, Penn-Jersey region, a Gallup Poll among youth conducted in January revealed that 49 percent of the students indicated that they thought AIDS could be contracted through blood donation.

"In 1986, 11 percent of our supply was collected from high school students," Gazzara said. "In 1987 that number dropped to nine percent."

First time donors, such as the high school students, are the area the Red Cross is trying to target right now. WilliamSherwood, M.D., director of the Penn-Jersey Region, feels that they have not lost many regular donors since they are familiar with procedures and realize that there is no chance of acquiring AIDS from donation, but the people who have not given blood previously are not as willing to give.

"People are confused," Gazzara stated. "They hear the message of blood and AIDS, and, yes, there is a small chance a person may get AIDS by receiving a transfusion. It is impossible, though, to get it from giving."

The demand for blood is increasing. Medical advances grow each year, and with that the need for

Connelly gets new director

By JIM BOWMAN
Assistant Features Editor

Last year, the logo and business insignia of Connelly Center read as follows:

Connelly Center
Villanova University

This year there is a new logo which now reads:

Villanova University
Connelly Center

The change would appear to be merely cosmetic, but it reflects a new attitude, one of service and Villanova pride. The source of this new attitude is Villanova's new director of Connelly Center, Tony Alfano.

"At times, people don't perceive us as being part of the University," explained Alfano. "I want everyone to know that we are a part of Villanova and we're here to help the faculty, administration and students in any way we can."

Alfano, a 1974 Villanova graduate, assumed control of the center in July, when former director Marc Tuchman left Villanova for a similar position at the University of California, Irvine.

Although the promotion has meant added responsibility, Alfano, who has worked at Connelly Center since its inception in 1979, has had little trouble making the transition.

"It was not that difficult. Marc (Tuchman) was involved with campus planning for the past few years and I became familiar with the administrative aspects of the center. Scheduling, working with the administration and appearing before the Board (of Trustees) are new to me, but I'm not having any problems getting adjusted."

After graduating from Villanova in 1974 with an undergraduate degree in accounting, Alfano immediately began working in Philadelphia as an accountant. He worked for three different Philadelphia firms through 1979, when the position at Connelly Center became available.

"Even as an undergrad, I had always wanted to work at Villanova. People told me to be patient, that something would come up. When I heard of the opening, I went through the interviewing process, and for whatever reason, they hired me," recalled Alfano.

Although managing a University center can be hectic and challenging, the fast pace and Villanova atmosphere were exactly what Alfano was looking for.

"I enjoy the constant change here. We do the same things, but it's always exciting. Every semester there are new faces and new people," he said.

"I also enjoy the philosophy and mission of Villanova. There is a definite morality and respect here — a good Catholic environment. It's been great for me and my family," said Alfano.

No radical changes are in store for this year, but some cosmetic changes will be implemented soon.

"We're probably going to change the menu a little and give a better variety of entrees. It's going to take a year to see big impacts," he explained.

"Right now, we're stressing service. We want to be more approachable for meetings, dinners, dances or whatever. Our doors are open to the campus community. We would like everyone to come and use us," he added.

Campus Ministry

By Fr. RAY JACKSON, O.S.A.

Biologically, it's only a pump. Metaphorically, it's at the center of human life. I am speaking about the heart, that dimension of the person which describes our attitudes. Augustine wrote that his own heart was restless since it longed to be united with God. How much of our own longing is tied to our search for God? The question confronts us with a need to look at some aspects of the heart.

A guilty heart is often burdened with fear. At times, we may hurt someone else by shouting at them, or ignoring their need for attention. Suddenly, it dawns on us that we were wrong, and we begin to feel guilty; we realize that we may lose their friendship or others may treat us the same way.

Oftentimes there is an ongoing fear that an alcoholic parent will never straighten out, of the friend who is strung out on drugs will never get help. We ourselves might be an addict afraid to admit our illness. Whatever the situation, Jesus calms our fears with his often repeated phrase "Be not afraid." He invites us to turn to God in our moments of anxiety and fear.

More difficult cases are those who are hard of heart. Jesus compares them to rocky ground unwilling to receive the word of God. Attitudes of revenge, pride and greed characterize people who care little at all for anyone other than themselves. Their eyes are blind, their ears are deaf and their hearts are closed to the love of God. In many ways, the fearful heart is better positioned for God's mercy since it knows its weakness; the hardened heart is too stubborn to realize its infirmity.

Yet, God's grace is open to all. Jesus came to preach repentance of sin and acceptance of God. He asked us to show mercy and to seek justice. He reminded us to be makers of peace and to turn the other cheek. With the beginning of a new school year, we might ask ourselves what is the state of our heart? Are we receptive to the healing and loving touch of Jesus? Do we take time, in spite of our busy schedules, to praise God in prayer and worship? Or is our heart anxious or hard? Have we shut out God as well as others? Let us pray for an openness of heart, that God's spirit may more easily enter.

Coca Cola adds life to 'Nova

By KAREN STOREY
Staff Reporter

The music is pounding, lights are glaring, wild videos surround you and all you can do is dance, dance, dance. No, it's not the "Trocadero," it's Club Coca-Cola. This sophisticated dance club will hit the Villanova Room on Sept. 17.

There will be door prizes, refreshments, two disc jockeys and all the latest videos. The entire event is being filmed by Reebok for national promotion. Your picture could end up on the pages of a magazine or on a television screen.

This nightclub spectacular is the brainchild of Chris Ippolito, concert coordinator for the Student Union. The party is a benefit to raise money for Special Olympics. Ippolito has been planning this event since the summer and feels "it will be of high-caliber. It is sure to impress the students. Also, it is a great social opportunity, a chance to meet new people," he explained.

Club Coca-Cola will have eye-catching special effects, strobe lighting, laser beams and fog machines. Giant video screens will show all the latest surf, beach and music videos. "It will be like walking into a disco, only better," says Ippolito.

Ippolito has great hopes for the year. He wants "to bring bigger and better concerts to Villanova and give new life to on-campus activities." If Club Coca-Cola is successful, a nightclub on campus will become a monthly event. "It is something for students to get psyched about," says Ippolito.

Club Coca-Cola will be in the Villanova Room from 7 p.m. until 1 a.m. on Sept. 17. Admission is $2. This event is being brought to you by the Student Union, Coke, Reebok, Panasonic, Ramsa, Brian Winthrop International and, of course, Chris Ippolito.

Come enjoy the party while helping someone special to become a champion at the Olympics!

blood grows. The Penn-Jersey Red Cross supplies 98 hospitals in the southeastern Pennsylvania and southern New Jersey Region. To efficiently service these hospitals, they need to collect blood from 1700 people each day.

"A liver transplant alone uses 100 pints of blood," Gazzara stated. "We really need healthy people to give more often to keep up with this type of demand," she added.

The "100% Guarantee" is a new educational campaign directed at potential donors to urge people to give blood. It is among the most comprehensive programs instituted by the Red Cross. With this campaign the Red Cross is hoping to attract new donors "especially during summer months, when collections have historically been slow," Gazzara said.

Because of this summer's severe hot weather, donations dropped drastically. Consequently, on Sept. 6 the Red Cross called an emergency blood shortage. Donors are desperately needed.

According to Gazzara, any healthy person between the ages of 17 and 65 is eligible to give blood. The process, from registration to refreshments, takes only an hour. More information may be obtained by calling 1-800-26-BLOOD. The phones are manned by registered nurses Monday through Friday from 9:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m.

Living off campus gives students slice of life

By KAREN IOVINO
Staff Reporter

The Villanova University that we return to in the fall always seems to be just a little bit different from the one we remember leaving last spring. A different major, roommate, even something as simple as a different dorm room can require adjustments and take some getting used to. However, most juniors returning to Villanova have to adjust to the biggest change yet in their college careers — off-campus living.

With barely enough room for 150 upperclassmen on campus, juniors and seniors (as well as an increasing number of underclassmen) populate the real estate up and down Lancaster Avenue. At first, commuting to school may seem like a dream come true: no more "Pit" food, no more visitation hours and, for some, the freedom of a car. However, this move into the pseudo "real world" brings with it problems of its own.

Those often dreaded "Pit" and "Spit" meals seem like heaven when all that is to be found in your kitchen is yogurt, bagels, diet soda and some skim milk. Time to go grocery shopping — only to find that you are low on cash and you forgot to clip coupons from the Acme circular this week. Better hit-up mom and dad for some money and food on Parents' Weekend. However, if you are like me and can't cook, it doesn't matter if you have food in your apartment or not. A college student can survive on Cheerios and bagels with tuna fish for a remarkable period of time.

No more visitation hours — but now landlords, building security and neighbors, who may be less than sympathetic to college students, must be contended with. Bills must be paid, doors kept closed and locked, and one must realize that those elderly neighbors may not appreciate listening to REM at midnight. The realization that not everyone around you is a college student is hard to get used to.

The excitement of having a car diminishes the first time you drive around the main lot for 40 minutes looking for a spot. With the $50 charged for parking, you would think that you would at least be guaranteed a spot but no ... eventually you park at 11:25 a.m. in the Pavilion for an 11:30 a.m. class at Tolentine.

Complaints aside, living off campus does have its good points. Sharing two bathrooms between four girls cannot even compare to sharing five with 52. A personal phone is an exciting novelty to anyone who lived on main campus for the past two years.

Your off-campus dwelling becomes more of a home than a dorm room ever did, and it provides a place to escape when you really want to get away from campus for a while. And the experience in real life concerns such as bills, upkeep and maintenance of your apartment or house, and cooking your own meals provides us with a new kind of wisdom — not just book-learning, but practical knowledge that will help us even after we leave the shelter of Villanova University.

Spectrum rocks with the Dead

By VICKI DI STEFANO
Staff Reporter

The Grateful Dead brought a psychedelic festival to Philadelphia with their sold out appearances in the Spectrum, Sept. 8, 9, 10 and 12. The 20-year-old band from the San Francisco Bay area is a phenomenon in the rock world and in any other world, for that matter. Their constant touring led to faithful disciples known as "Deadheads," who follow the band across the nation. This cultlike devotion is reminiscent of 1960s flower-child lifestyles.

In Philly, Roosevelt Park evolved into a cosmic campground. Painted vans, Volkswagens with batik draperies, and authentic Indian teepees provided temporary homes for Deadheads who journeyed from the far corners of psychedelia for the astral event. License plates from as far away as Arizona and California were in evidence.

The inhabitants of these makeshift dwellings do not hold jobs, for work impairs concert attendance. They are self-supporting, and peddle their wares for income to support their Grateful Dead habit.

Tie-dyed costumes, yarn bracelets, jewelry and dozens of other handcrafted items are sold at reasonable prices. These commodities have the additional charm of being one of the kind items not likely to be available at Macy's.

The Dead's popularity has increased with last year's release of the LP Touch of Grey, drawing mainstream audiences to their consistently sold out concerts. Monday's show marked the 36th consecutive sellout for the Dead at the Spectrum since 1972.

Tickets for these last four dates were at a premium; all four shows sold out within hours of going on sale in August. Four years ago, the Grateful Dead's Easter visit to the Spectrum featured four general admission shows which did not sell out for 10 days. Conventional crowds now flock to Grateful Dead shows.

Inside the Spectrum walls, the party matched the intensity of the events outdoors. A five-piece bongo band set up in the corridor, where there was as much dancing as within the arena itself.

It is not uncommon for musicians to bring their instruments inside the stadium during a Dead show, as many did during the Philly tour stop. Nor is it forbidden for audience members to tape the band's performance; the Grateful Dead are actually agreeable to this practice and a thriving bootleg market has been in existence almost since the band's evolution.

The Grateful Dead's Spectrum dates contributed what many loyal followers consider to be one of the band's most hypnotic tour stops in recent memory. Friday evening exploded with the opening number "Hell in a Bucket," which describes life on the road with the Dead. The refrain, "I may be going to hell in a bucket babe/But at least I'm enjoying the ride," elicited manic response from every section of the theatre.

A spell was cast over the audience with the second number, "Sugaree," a creation of the Jerry Garcia band. "Drums in Space," a Deadshow standard, is traditionally a part of the second set. Friday's space jam was, as always, an improvisational mixture of ethereal rhythms and mesmerizing light displays.

The Grateful Dead played at the Spectrum on Sept. 8, 9, 11 and 12. They have sold out a total of 36 Spectrum concerts since 1972.

"Sugar Magnolia" soon followed in all its glory, but the show ended all too soon with Bob Dylan's "Quinn the Eskimo," the only encore of the evening.

Sunday night rolled around with "Aiko Aiko" jubilantly heralding the beginning of the first set, which featured folksy blues tunes like the "Memphis Blues" and "Tennessee Jed."

"Fire on the Mountain" ignited the arena and lit up the second set. The crowd joined the band with the inception of "Not Fade Away," and sang the chorus a capella for 10 minutes. Long after the lights went on following the soulful encore "Baby blue," the chanting of "Not Fade Away" was still being sung.

The unity and peace that pervades at a Grateful Dead show stretches beyond the kindred spirit of community and sharing of food and possessions. Thoughtful Deadheads who were lucky enough to attain coveted seats on the floor circulated a special notice to the masses participating in the preshow festivities. Colored notes were distributed to encourage the audience to unite in a birthday tribute to drummer Mickey Hart, who turned 45 that day. Hart was greeted on stage by thousands of voices serenading him with the "Happy Birthday" song.

The Dead's longevity is a mystery to some, but a fact of life to those who enjoy their enigmatic incantations and the escape into another world furnished by the atmosphere of their legendary concerts. In the words of a bumper sticker sold by a bearded man in a rainbow beanie, "The Grateful Dead are not the best at what they do, they're the only ones who do what they do."

Led Zep convention proves worthwhile

By NICK MAGALIO
Staff Reporter

"And a new day will dawn, for those who stay long, and the forests will echo with laughter. Does anybody remember laughter?" Well, as evidenced by the huge turnout at the 20th Anniversary Extravaganza and Record Mart in honor of Led Zeppelin, many people remember laughter and the awesome display of musical talent generated by the four man band from England.

The two day convention was held at the Meadowlands Hilton Hotel in Secaucus, New Jersey and there were many tables of merchandise for the true Zeppelin fanatic to choose from. The show also had special guests, videos and slide shows, a museum, auctions and raffles, and two tribute bands, Physical Graffiti and Kashmir.

There were over 75 tables of merchandise in the main room of the Led Zeppelin Extravaganza. A Led Zep collector could acquire bootleg audio and video concerts, rare 8 x 10 photographs, limited edition lithograph prints, back stage passes and tickets from concerts and a wide assortment of posters.

Among items that stood out included autographed Robert Plant items from his recent Now and Zen tour, actual tickets from the 1980 tour that never materialized because of the untimely death of drummer John Henry Bonham, and "The Object."

"The Object" was an odd shaped sculpture given out by Led Zeppelin's record company, Swan Song, to executives and members of the record world to promote the group's album Presence. "The Object" was the most unique item on the tables at the convention.

Auctions and raffles brought a host of rare Led Zeppelin artifacts to the hands of collectors. These items included rare original poster artwork, a limited number of tickets from past concerts and autographed Robert Plant promotional gimmicks from his Now and Zen tour. One raffle that brought a lot of attention was a Led Zeppelin II album signed by Jimmy Page, Robert Plant, John Paul Jones and John Bonham.

A tour of the Led Zeppelin museum gave an interesting look at different items such as rare photos, replica blimps, and other rare paraphernalia. Gold and platinum albums, the key to city of New Orleans given to band by the mayor in 1977 and a satin jacket by Jimmy Page on the 1977 American tour were a few of the different items to be found in the museum.

Also included in the Extravaganza were two special guest speakers and two tribute bands. Eddie Kramer, the engineer for the band who helped arrange the background sounds to hits like "Whole Lotta Love" and "In the Evening" and Chris Farlowe, the lead singer for Jimmy Page's Outrider tour, each spoke a few times during the two-day event.

The two tribute bands, Physical Graffiti and Kashmir, put on amazing "replica" shows and generated a lot of excitement for the crowds.

All in all, the 20th Anniversary Extravaganza in honor of Led Zeppelin was a definite must see for the diehard Zep fan.

If you were a "fool in the rain" and missed this "south bound suarez" because of a "communication breakdown," the next convention should not be "ten years gone" and a Zep fan can find his "stairway to heaven" by attending "what is and what will always be."

Progress with new music at the 23 East

By KATHRYN QUIGLEY
Entertainment Editor

U Kan danze Tuesdays at the 23 East Cabaret in Ardmore. No, this does not refer to German tourists jumping around to disco, but instead, to the name of the 23 East's progressive dance music night.

Progressive music, especially progressive dance music, is something not all college students are familiar with, although it is often referred to as "college-oriented music." Artists such as The Cure, R.E.M., and Sinead O'Connor fall under this category.

The roots of progressive music are in England. After it comes to America, it " . . . gradually works its way through the underground and on up [to the progressive scene]" explains Christopher Golub, D.J. for U Kan danse.

Golub, a junior economics major at Villanova, is also general manager and program director for WKVU.

Golub thought up the idea for a progressive dance night and presented it to the 23 East's management. Karen Saunders, who is in charge of public relations, liked the idea.

"We felt a need to showcase new music, especially dance music," said Saunders.

The progressive dance night was originally billed as "Villanova night," when it became a Thursday night fixture last fall. However, it faced too much competition from other area bars and was switched to Tuesdays where it fared much better. Shortly after that, the 23 East began showcasing local bands on Tuesdays as well.

The Innocence Mission, a band that recently signed a contract with A&M Records, will appear at U Kan danse on Sept. 20.

Movie is packed with satire

By DINA INNELLA
Staff Reporter

The moon in Parador inspires pure passion and romance to all who visit there. Where is this wonderful place you may ask? All in the mind of writer-director Paul Mazursky, best known for his work in the insane comedy, "Down and Out in Beverly Hills." He has returned with the delightful satire, "Moon Over Parador," which takes place in Parador, a fictional country located in Latin America that is ruled by a dictator.

In the movie, the leading character, who is an actor, must take the place of the country's president. According to the Philadelphia Inquirer, Mazursky was "inspired by the fact that an actor has been running our country for eight years." This is only the beginning of the satire in "Moon Over Parador." The film has many facets and satirizes everything from actors to tourists.

Even though the plot seems ridiculous, Richard Dreyfuss molds the part and makes it completely convincing.

"Moon Over Parador" begins with a flashback in which Jack Noah (Richard Dreyfuss) describes the story of his adventures in Parador. Noah is an underrated actor who has just completed his latest movie which was filmed in Parador.

Parador is ruled by Dictator Alfonzo Simms (also played by Dreyfuss) and is constantly under Communist threat. Noah, it must be noted, is well known for his extraordinary impressions of the dictator and, once coerced, can give an uncanny performance. His impersonations get him into the absurd predicament that follows.

Fate has it that the dictator dies suddenly and his aides believe that it is not the right time for their president to be deceased. From there, as one can probably guess, the inevitable happens.

Noah is forced into playing the part of the dictator by the dictator's right hand man, Roberto Strausmann (Raul Julia). The irony of it all is that Noah agreed to take the part, not because he would have been killed, but because it was the "ultimate role."

Pretty soon Noah starts to enjoy the part of the dictator, especially when he meets the dictator's mistress, Madonna (Sonia Braga). Together the two add romance in this altogether bright comedy.

Even though the plot seems ridiculous, Dreyfuss molds the part and makes it completely convincing. He is hilarious and added dimension to his characters. He has proven once again that he is not only a dramatic actor, but a comedian as well.

What is lovable about "Moon Over Parador" is the excellent cast of characters. Each one adds to the movie his or her own flair, which creates surprise and adventure. Some brief but memorable appearances are made by Jonathan Winters, as a CIA agent, Charo, as the dictator's personal maid, and even Mazursky himself dressed in drag as the dictator's 'Mama." Sammy Davis Jr. and Dick Cavett also appear, playing themselves.

"Moon Over Parador" is a brilliant satire that provides many laughs that are memorable. As the movie progresses, we see the many levels of Mazursky's work. Jam-packed with satire, romance and action, the film is quite refreshing and fun.

U Kan danze night

Golub describes this as " ... a 45 minute set of the hottest Philadelphia talent." Acts who have played on Tuesdays include Ocean Blue, a young band from the Lancaster area and The Innocence Mission, a group whose sound has been compared to that of 10,000 Maniacs. The Innocence Mission, who recently signed a recording contract with A&M Records, will play the 23 East again on Sept. 27.

U Kan danze is the new and improved version of progressive dance night. No longer Villanova or WKVU night, it is now " ... a college night," according to Golub. "It's a chance for students from such schools as St. Joe's, Haverford, West Chester as well as V.U. to hear the new stuff that's happening."

There will also be many more promotions on Tuesdays, according to Saunders, including drink specials, album, poster and t-shirt give-aways; free coupons for compact discs as well as special appearances by members of local bands.

"In addition to the local bands who are performing that night, other better-known bands will arrive between 11-11:30 p.m. to meet with people and give away albums," clarifies Saunders. The featured band for Sept. 20 is VHF and Dynagroove will be the special guests.

All promotions aside, the music is the core of Tuesdays at the 23 East. According to Golub, more than half the people who come in are there for the music and that number is increasing. Golub gets a lot of questions such as "Who sings this song?" and "Where can I buy this album?"

"I do a lot of writing down of names of bands," Golub says.

Still, some people's tastes in music are hard to break. "Last semester, we got a few kids who were asking, 'Where's Madonna?' " says Golub. "To that, I'd promptly say, 'Madonna will not be played here.' "

"To that, I'd promptly say 'Madonna will not be played here.'"

Golub does not alienate pop, however. He plays pop mixes and takes requests. Still, it is progressive music that he feels is on the cutting edge of the music scene.

"Bands like Tommy Conwell, Sinead O'Connor and Gene Loves Jezebel are right on the brink [of success]."

He points out that two to three years ago, bands like U2 and R.E.M. were played mainly on college radio and today are successful. Golub says that the music he plays today are the hits of tomorrow. In addition to that, "being in college gives you the opportunity to experience many new things ... Why limit yourself?"

The 23 East Cabaret is located at 28 East Lancaster Ave. in Ardmore. It is approximately three miles from Villanova and is accessible by the R-5 train.

Admission to U Kan danze is $3; $2 with valid college ID. There is no cover before 10 p.m. You must be over 21 years of age with proper I.D.

Comedy dominates screen

By STEPHEN POWERS
Staff Reporter

With the summer now behind us, Hoilywood's major movie studios are now looking toward the fall to be a lucrative film season. While the arrival of fall used to mean slow business at the box office, last year's blockbuster "Fatal Attraction" and the previous year's "'Crocodile' Dundee" disproved that theory.

Several of this year's fall movies were originally scheduled for summer release, but were postponed with the hopes of attracting bigger audiences during a less-competitive season. These films include the just-released Richard Dreyfuss comedy, "Moon Over Parador," "Punchline," with Sally Fields and Tom Hanks as stand-up comedians, and "Alien Nation," a science-fiction picture.

SOAP SUDS: The nighttime soaps return for another season of scheming and back-stabbing next month, but the producers of these once top-rated shows are making several changes to stem the steady ratings decline that has happened over the last few years.

While the fall also used to mean more serious films, comedy is proving to be big business. Steve Guttenberg falls in love with a ghost (Daryl Hannah) in "High Spirits"; Bill Murray stars in "Scrooged," a take-off on "A Christmas Carol"; Dennis Quaid and Jessica Lange adjust to life after college in "Everybody's All-American" and the unlikely duo of Danny DeVito and Arnold Schwarzenegger play the title roles in "Twins."

Other fall releases to watch for include "Fresh Horses," in which "Pretty in Pink" stars Molly Ringwald and Andrew McCarthy re-team for a coming-of-age story. Corey Haim ("The Lost Boys") stars in "Watchers," which loosely based on Dean R. Koontz's best-seller about a genetic experiment that accidentally produces a monster. And the entire original cast of "Cocoon" is back for "Cocoon: The Return," which focuses on the senior citizens and their alien friends returning to earth.

One movie to watch out for is "Ernest Saves Christmas." Obviously, "Ernest Goes to Camp" was not enough to kill the chances for this sequel.

And the entire original cast of "Cocoon" is back for "Cocoon: The Return," which focuses on the senior citizens and their alien friends returning to earth.

CBS' "Dallas" will not even be a soap anymore when it starts its eleventh season — the show has dropped its serial format, and each story will now begin and end in the same episode. Also the large cast has been cut in half, and will now include only the members of the original Ewing family. As for the rumors about Victoria Principal's return, Larry Hagman, now the soap's co-executive producer, has been negotiating with Principal for several months to reprise her role as Pam, but no agreement has yet been reached.

"Falcon Crest," also on CBS, faces several cast changes and a change in the production team. Kristian Alfonso (ex-Hope on "Days of Our Lives") joins the cast as the daughter of the vineyard's foreman, whose family will figure prominently in this season's storyline.

ABC is so sure that "Dynasty" will perform poorly in its new timeslot against NBC's "Cheers," that it has only ordered 13 new episodes for the coming season (if the show does reasonably well in the ratings, more could be made). In addition to its tough new timeslot, "Dynasty" must also deal with the absence of Krystle, since Linda Evans is only contracted to appear in seven episodes this year. The producers hope that having the wealthy Carringtons interact with some working-class characters will give the show the energy it needs to survive.

"Knots Landing," on CBS, is in the best shape of all the soaps. It comes in a strong second to NBC's "L.A. Law" on Thursday nights, and is one of CBS' highest rated (and most consistent) shows. Look for the same cast, and the same type of stories, to be back this season.

SHORT TAKES: "Spenser: For Hire" may not be back on ABC this year, but sidekick Hawk, played by Avery Brooks, will. ABC has ordered 13 episodes of the spinoff as a mid-season replacement ... CBS' new "Mary Tyler Moore" may scrap its pilot and shoot a one-hour premiere. Ditto for the "Dirty Dancing" series ... Bette Midler's "Beaches" opens in December, not October as reported in last week's column ... Megan Gallagher, who played Judy on the now-cancelled "Slap Maxwell," joins ABC's "China Beach" this season as the base's new D.J. She replaces the energetic Chloe Webb (Laurette), who has departed to pursue a film career.

Young bands take center

By BILL CARR and MICHAEL AIMETTE
Staff Reporters

Generally speaking, talented young bands show contempt towards critical comparisons to older, more established groups. This fact can certainly be applied to The Primitives, an immensely talented band, who have, through their use of fuzzy guitars and a female lead singer, drawn obvious comparisons with Blondie and have prompted vocalist Tracey Tracey to remark, "If another critic says we sound like Blondie, I'll rip his eyes out." Disregarding threats, the similarities are evident. Depending on what song you listen to, The Primitives also sound like Katrina & The Waves, The Bangles, The Beach Boys, and The Go-Go's.

These are all rather good influences, but good influences mean nothing, however, without good songs. Fear not — The Primitives have 14 of them on Lovely, including the No. 1 single in England, "Crash." Tracey Tracey does what many good female singers do, that is, balance the band's aggressive instrumentation with a voice of almost fragile quality. The Primitives truly make good on their name, too: loud guitars, relatively simple chords, and all but three songs under three minutes long. Completely original or not, The Primitives' debut album is simply an excellent example of power pop.

Graham Parker is one of those musicians who seems destined to remain forever bound by the label "cult artist."

Well, Graham Parker produced yet another excellent album this summer — but does anyone care? Graham Parker is one of those musicians who seems destined to remain forever bound by the label "cult artist." This is quite a shame, because Graham Parker has been one of the most consistently engaging and intelligent artists of the last two decades. Parker is one of the founding fathers of the post-punk generation, a critical baby once mentioned in the same breath as fellow post-punkers Joe Jackson and Elvis Costello. Parker, in fact, is often compared to Costello, and the equation holds up. Parker writes with the same tough, I-swallowed-a-dictionary style — and his voice sounds like Costello's.

Parker's summer release, The Mona Lisa's Sister, is his best album since the universally acclaimed Squeezing Out Sparks. It seemed like the perfect album to garner for Parker the success in America that has always eluded him; The Mona Lisa's Sister is replete with simple, yet very clever and insightful songs driven along by Parker's soulful acoustic guitar and versatile singing. He switches effortlessly from energetic belter to soulful crooner.

The Mona Lisa's Sister won the usual favorable reviews associated with Parker's work, but it is quickly receding out of view like his other albums. Case in point: Parker is scheduled to play at the Theatre of the Living Arts October 8 and 9, but get this — he's playing two shows each night! Movies play twice a night, not rock stars.

Parker ponders the mystique of stardom on the song "Success." He concedes, "You can't be happy while/Someone else has a fistful." But Graham Parker is going to do it his way if he does it at all. Do Graham and yourself a favor: take a listen.

Other Stuff

The tentative title of the long-overdue new Replacements album is Dead Man's Pop. Maybe The Replacements have given up on the living as a potential audience. You can hardly blame them ... The Psychedelic Furs' greatest hits album entitled All Of This And Nothing is now in stores. Simply put, if you like The Furs, you will like this album. It's a good overview of their career with a generous sampling of the better earlier material. The album includes one new song, "All That Money Wants," an encouraging return to the murky grunge that gave The Furs their style. Two bonus tracks are included on the CD version.

Living Colour releases Vivid album

By ANDREW MATHIS
Staff Reporter

Somewhere between Jimi Hendrix and Kool and the Gang, it seemed as if black musicians had lost their grip on rock and roll. Fortunately Vivid, the long-awaited debut from the quartet Living Colour, is bringing the good name of rock and roll back to those people who started it all. With strong vocals, incredible guitar work, and a very tight rhythm section, Living Colour is bound to be the next great rock and roll sensation.

An excerpt from Franklin Delano Roosevelt's "We have nothing to fear but fear itself" speech opens the album as a prelude to the opening song, "Cult of Personality." At first, the song sounds incredibly similar to something you would find on a (pre-Hagar) Van Halen album, but it is soon obvious that there is more to this song than the searing guitar that is eminent throughout the song, as well as much of the album.

"Cult of Personality" is successful in showing very early the strengths of singer Carey Glover, whose voice is similar to both Stevie Wonder and Stevie Ray Vaughn at the same time. The guitar solo supplied by virtuoso Vernon Reid is unbelievable. By setting the musical tone for most of the album, as well as having good lyrics, "Cult of Personality" is a major candidate for best song of the album.

It clearly shows that Living Colour's roots lie not only in rock and blues, but in funk as well.

"I Want to Know" is a love song of sorts, located on the first side of the album. The vocals are of particular interest on this song with great harmonies in the choruses and strong solo vocals in the verses. The general tone of the song, however, is similar to that of the opener, as is the tone of the remainder of the first side.

"Open Letter (to a Landlord)," which closes the first side, is misleading in that it seems to start differently, but soon comes out sounding very much the same. One good point about the first side's closing song is its strong

Chicago and Heart ignite summer crowds

Chicago, the band with the big horn sound, came to Philadelphia on July 26 to perform at the Spectrum. The group was promoting their latest album, Chicago 19. It was Chicago's second tour with Bill Champlin and Jason Scheff as the replacements for Peter Cetera on most lead vocals. While Champlin and Scheff are both talented singers and musicians, their vocals were just not the same as Cetera's. "Stay The Night" and "You're The Inspiration" simply sounded odd without Cetera's distinctive high-pitched voice.

"Stay the Night" and "You're The Inspiration" simply sounded odd without Cetera's distinctive high-pitched voice.

Their newer material, such as "I Don't Want to Live Without Your Love" seemed to work better, as did their older music. Robert Lamm, one of the original members, really shone as he performed "Saturday In the Park," a song he wrote. Lamm is the "social commentator" of the group. Before one song, he exhorted the audience to vote. "It's the only way to stop the hurt [though] neither one [candidate] is the best we've got."

Chicago played a relatively long set of 20 songs and two encores. The horn section, Chicago's trademark sound, was one of the strongest parts of the band, although they occasionally came close to drowning out the other members.

On June 22, Heart, led by sisters Ann and Nancy Wilson, broke through the roaring cheers of a near sold-out Spectrum with an extended version of "Shell Shock." For just under two hours, the five member group rocked the house with a series of power ballads about love and lust. These included: "Never," "I Want You So Bad," "These Dreams" and "What About Love?" The band chose a well-balanced selection of music from their albums that stretch from the '70s to the present, each showing their talent and popularity.

Heart concluded with a sing-along version of "Barracuda" and two encores, which included "Crazy On You" and their own version of Led Zeppelin's "Rock and Roll." Heart, specifically Ann and Nancy Wilson, are a rock band that has truly perfected the art of retaining the pop chart edge.

Singer-songwriter Michael Bolton opened the concert for Heart. Bolton is best known for songs he has written for Cher, The Pointer Sisters and Kenny Rogers. On his own, he has hit the top of the charts with "That's What Love Is All About" and a remake version of "(Sittin' on) The Dock of the Bay."

Bolton's third album, The Hunger, is currently climbing the charts. He has shown his talent through his words and is now placing emphasis on singing his own songs.

Big Audio Dynamite takes new approach

Big Audio Dynamite
Tighten Up Vol. '88
CBS Records

By CHRIS KLIMOWICZ
Staff Reporter

"Sit tight and listen keenly, while I play for you a brand new musical biscuit." Big Audio Dynamite fans will recognize this overdub from their No. 10 Uppington St. album. It is relevant here because the audience should listen keenly to their latest album, Tighten Up Vol. 88. It may not be brand new, but it is definitely better.

After Mick Jones left the Clash, he collaborated with Don Letts and other musicians to form Big Audio Dynamite. Their premiere record, This is B.A.D., was one of the first albums to seriously use overdubs as an intricate part of a song. The music was simple — certainly not artistically challenging. But this seemed to be the point, so the sound effects would be prominent. The first album had a unique sound that was highly listenable and very much original.

Joe Strummer returned to help the band create a sound of its own on the second album. The result was No. 10 Uppington St., which has a very reggae sound, with the overdubs playing a lesser role.

The new album is also decidedly less political, and in turn is able to have more fun.

This record contained strong political overtones, and some songs seemed to labor under this point. In addition, there was a bit too much repetition in style.

Tighten Up Vol. '88 is most definitely the best of both worlds. From the first cut "Rock 'Non Stop," it gives a very energetic, danceable sound without being empty pop.

The new album is also decidedly less political, and in turn is able to have more fun. Mick Jones is very comfortable with the style he and the boys developed on No. 10 Uppington St., and was able to let the listener in on their return to the fun of This is B.A.D.

There is a much more confident sound here than on their second endeavor. Tighten Up is able to combine the free form of their sampling with a pop sensibility. The album is well paced and is not laden with moody lyrics.

They are able to make their social commentary on songs like "Funny Names," "under this skin say we're all the same/ how come when I turn my back/ you call me funny names." And they comment on certain people in the news like Imelda Marcos in "2000 Shoes."

It is refreshing to find this kind of insight, and have it made with a comic twist. What is said here is done with a lighter attitude than the preceding album. The boys do not want themselves or their audience to take them too seriously.

The overall feeling of the album is best summed up by the last cut, "Just Play Music!" There was a reason why this song came last. B.A.D. wants to end with music that will, "move my feet and touch my soul/ bass sound/ drum beat/ Rock and Roll."

The Sugar Cubes
Life's Too Good
Elecktra

If you fall into the nebulous group of music fans that dig "new wave and progressive" tunes, but still feel a certain amount of guilty pleasure when listening to top 40, then there is a very good chance that you will like the Sugar Cubes.

Their sound is as striking as the lime green cover sleeve that contains it. Upon the first listening of the album Life's Too Good, the voice of lead singer Bjork grabs you. It is not quite like anything heard before.

That is because this band is from Iceland, which as we know, is not famous for producing well-known musicians. Their sound is not revolutionary, and will not reshape contemporary music. It is, however, very listenable and very enjoyable. It has a springy pop sound that is great for the car stereo on a hot, summer day.

It has a springy pop sound that is great for the car stereo on a hot, summer day.

"Birthday" was the early release from the album, and was originally released in Iceland. Perhaps the best cut, it contains some of Bjork's best screaming. She sings with vigor, harmony, and with a wonderful childlike quality.

Ray Doskus of The Source said, "The lyrics . . . are stories . . . told in a uninhibited youthlike manner." This captures an essence of the album. It is fun, simple, and easy to listen to.

"Coldsweat" is the recent video release, and a fair representative of the album. The sounds here are the guitar and Bjork's voice in a high frequency, and Einar's voice coupled with the bass and drums to create a blend of extreme sound.

Instead of relying on a strong mid-range of sound, this group works with the "twang" of a guitar in "Deus" and the heavy bass of "Birthday" to mix the listener into the song itself.

The vocalists finish this effect with their unique use of their knowledge of English. Remember, English is not their native tongue. They play with words with an almost tongue-in-cheek crooning. Most of these songs had to be translated from Icandic, but that fact is well hidden in the natural rhythm these songs possess.

The album is very danceable if that is a priority to you. Their full range of sounds, coupled with accessible lyrics, make this album a must for all hard core progressive fans, and those that skirt the outer edge.

Hooters come home to debut new music

By VICKI DiSTEFANO
Staff Reporter

Philly's own Hooters continued their ongoing affair with the Philadelphia area cabarets when they performed at the 23 East in Ardmore Sept. 7.

The group sported a different look but the same enthusiasm that characterized their November 1985 performance at Villanova's duPont Pavillion. Gone are the days of the musicians' color-coded dressing. Previously, each of the five Hooters had a trademark color; when the group made appearances, each member would be clad head to toe in one of the three primary colors, or white or black.

The monochromatic outfits were offset by sculptured coiffeurs which required mountains of mousse. Today, the band's stage garb is casual, accompanied by longer hair and a freewheeling attitude which emphasizes their music and not their image.

A new addition to the otherwise original Hooters lineup is bassist Fran Smith, who is Andy King's replacement. Although a newcomer, Smith's sound was right in tune with the rest of the Hooters.

Eric Bazilian and Rob Hyman, lead guitarist and keyboardist respectively, are responsible for formulating the musical compositions and distinct sound of the Hooters. The influence of Jamaican ska rhythyms, English classical rock and Celtic folk lend an international sound to the Hooters' performance. Instruments which are unorthodox by typical pop rock standards are utilized by the Hooters to produce unique melodies. The combination of mandolins, recorders, accordians and acoustic guitars blend in a fusion of medieval folk appeal. The melodica, aka "hooter" lends the band its name and its orgiastic sound.

The audience's reception of the singing-in-the-shower classics "Karla with a K" and "Blood from a Stone" proved that familiarity does not always breed contempt. The Hooters have a knack for altering their studio material in live performances so that well-known songs will not sound stale.

Eric Bazilian's recorder solo of "Greensleeves" quietly captured the attention of the entire cabaret. When the beat changed, the crowd leapt to its feet to dance to "South Ferry Road" and "Day by Day." After the closing notes of the latter song, WMMR radio personality Joe Bonnadonna announced to the cabaret that the second half of the show would be comprised of new material. The Hooters would take into consideration the response received by each number. The reception of the new tunes, Bonnadonna explained, would be a determining factor for the band to decide which selections would be recorded for their forthcoming album.

The new original offerings "Blame it on the Bible," "Don't Knock It Till You Try It," and "Magarita" are spirited samplings of the Hooter's latest work. These songs are also hard to distinguish from one another.

One tune which stirred opinionated controversy was a major revision of an old Hooters song. The title track of the Hooters' first album "Amore" is one of the group's best songs to date. Until now, this cut has been excluded from the Hooters' LPs on the Columbia label. The all new version of "Amore" disappointed faithful Hooters' fans. The racy lyrics were replaced with mediocre verse, and the melody was diluted. Other songs from "Amore," including "Zombies" and "Blood from a Stone," both part of the first set, were rearranged in similar fashion for inclusion on Columbia releases. In both cases, the song's artistic appeal suffered from the alteration; the same is true of the rewriting of "Amore."

The 23 East's slightly elevated stage and limited standing-room-only capacity creates an intimacy between the featured act and the crowd. This physicality was well employed by the Hooters, who have always enjoyed personal rapport with their audience. Group members took the time during their performance to shake hands, hug and dance with their fans. Saxophone in hand, Bazilian made a leap at one point into the throng of dancers in front of the stage, joining them in their reverie.

If the Hooters can avoid the trap of playing new music that is indistinguishable from old material, they will continue to captivate their audience and watch it increase.

Record Roundup . . . UB40 and Robert Cray

By ANDREW MATHIS
Staff Reporter

Don't Be Afraid of the Dark
The Robert Cray Band

Many critics saw Robert Cray at the time of his debut as the next great blues-oriented guitar talent. His debut album, Strong Persuader, proved this. However, his second album, Don't Be Afraid of the Dark, is a weak follow-up. While Cray still has a strong hold on the blues, the album is uneventful and somewhat boring as a whole.

The problems, to name a few, are that not only is Cray getting less exposure as a guitarist and less solos on this album, but there seem to be horns everywhere on this album, supplied by Memphis Horns. These horns ruin the title track. "Night Patrol," which closes the first side, would have been a much stronger title effort.

The problem most likely lies in the fact that out of 10 tracks that make up this release, Cray only has writing credit, even partially, on five. The songs of which he took part in the writing are the better songs, but even they are lacking something.

While the album is not a complete loss, with solid tunes like "Don't You Even Care" and "Laugh Out Loud," it fails to meet the standard set by Cray's previous work. While hardcore blues fans are bound to love it, Don't Be Afraid of the Dark is typical sophomore slump material from an artist who could have avoided such a fate.

UB40
A+M Records

UB40 is the first album of new material by the multi-racial, eight-piece, reggae band since 1986's Rat in the Kitchen. In a few words, it is an average reggae album, which means it is below average for UB40. In general, it is the least socially motivated album that the band has ever released in its seven album history, and with the exception of one or two songs, not up to par.

The album opens with "Dance with the Devil," which also appears as a reprise at the album's close. It is an instrumental to showcase the band's musical talent, but comes off as being rather boring. Featured on the album is "Breakfast in Bed," a duet with Chrissie Hynde of the Pretenders. Unfortunately, her previous duet with UB40, "I Got U Babe" is much better.

The one bright spot on the album seems to be "Come Out to Play," a terrific reggae jam, which should be infiltrating the airwaves rather than the previously released "Red Red Wine," which is old news to self-respecting UB40 fans. The two socially motivated songs, "Contaminated Minds" and "Matter of Time" are satisfactory, but fail to really hit home.

UB40 is coming off of a loss of one of its main sound men, Ray Falconer, and seems to be trying to write more light-hearted material, perhaps to alleviate tension brought on by this loss. Unfortunately, UB40 is at its best when the band is more serious. Hopefully UB40's next effort will be more on the mark. For now, UB40 fans will have to put up with average work.

Luciano entertains off the diamond

By ALLEN AMBROSINO
Assistant Entertainment Editor

Remembrances of Swings Past
Ron Luciano and David Fisher
Bantam Books

One of the most unrewarding and difficult occupations in the world is being an umpire in professional baseball. Managers kick dirt on them, every player in the league makes more money and they have to spend nine months out of every year in low-grade hotels. To the average person, it does not seem like an enviable situation. As a matter of fact, it sounds like a recurring nightmare that will never end.

However, there is at least one exception to every rule. In the world of umpires, the exception's name is Ron Luciano. He spent his entire major league umpiring career having fun and entertaining crowds in every city. Shooting players out at first base, eating food during the games and talking to the fans were some reasons for his popularity around the league.

After Luciano's retirement in 1980, he unsuccessfully attempted to become a broadcaster, store owner and commercial actor. When all seemed to be lost, he realized that his baseball experiences would make a great book. As a result, Luciano collaborated with author David Fisher to write the best-selling The Umpire Strikes Back, Strike Two and The Fall of the Roman Umpire.

Because of these great successes, Luciano and Fisher recently wrote Remembrances of Swings Past. It is one of the few sports books that makes the reader laugh out loud from beginning to end. For people who love the game of baseball, his stories will surprise and enlighten you about what goes on off the baseball field.

For people who love the game of baseball, his stories will surprise and enlighten you about what goes on off the baseball field.

When Luciano talks about the characters of the game, he shows that players in the 1930s and '40s had a lot more on their minds than just money. They had fun playing the game and did not take the time to bother with agents or incentive clauses. This book makes the baseball fan see that baseball 40 years ago was just a game and not a cold business. As you can see, sometimes progress is not entirely beneficial.

It is really incredible that Luciano can come up with all of these funny moments in baseball time and time again. However, it just goes to prove that there is no end to the stories about our national pastime. That is what makes baseball so great.

Luciano's style and approach to umpiring are proof that you can have a good time in just about any profession. He added another dimension to the game as an umpire and now, as an author, to the literary world. He has developed a large following and hopefully will publish a fifth book sometime in the spring of 1989.

Living Colour

social commentary, which shows that Living Colour is a band with a conscience and a strong stand on the plight of the poor.

At the beginning of side two is another contender for best song on the album. Weak lyrical content is about the only thing that keeps "Funny Vibe" from being an absolute funk classic. Hearing this song will convince any skeptic that Living Colour, from Vernon Reid to drummer William Calhoun, are among the most talented musicians working today.

"Broken Hearts," also on the second side, is highlighted by a great solo by bassist Muzz Skillings, whose talents are also evident on "Glamour Boys," a song produced by none other than Mick Jagger of the Rolling Stones. Jagger is also responsible for the production on "Which Way to America?," which closes the second side.

One of the most interesting songs to be found anywhere on the album is "What's Your Favorite Color?," which acts as a "theme song" for the band. It clearly shows that Living Colour's roots lie not only in rock and blues, but in funk as well. This song makes it more obvious than ever that Living Colour's approach is one of integration of several styles, with a successful outcome.

The only real problem that exists with Vivid is a bit of inconsistency in the songwriting. It seems that with the exception of "Cult of Personality," Living Colour finds it difficult to combine great music with lyrics that work. Still, one must remember that Vivid is a debut album and that, with any luck at all, Living Colour will release subsequent albums and continue their interpretation of a once-lost musical tradition.

Student Government Presidential Candidates

SEAN CLOSKEY

I, Sean Closkey, am running for Student Government president. I know that my experience combined with my realistic outlook will make me an effective leader. The difference between realism and idealism is that an idealist believes in the things we want to happen and the realist believes in the things that can happen.

We all want to see the most effective Student Government in Villanova history. But we can and will see a government which is very limited by a term which last only six months. I see the purpose of this government as on which must follow through on the issues of the past while developing our leaders of the future.

This government must be aware that its purpose is to represent the students. This government must remind the administration that the students are not here because Villanova exists, but Villanova exists because the students are here.

Vote Sean Closkey and together we will remind the administration why they are here.

JOHN B. LEWIS

I am running for Student Government president because I see opportunities for change and improvement in University affairs.

As a freshman, I was inspired by Joe Allman's promise to reform Student Government and fight for student rights.

In many ways the promise has been realized and yet our fight must continue. The promise is realized when students form the most productive and vocal core of the University Senate. The promise is realized when student rights are protected by Phil Brach and ACLU.

The promise is realized when the administration listens and acts on our work; the coed dorms report, the budget process reform, the elimination of wasteful spending and the development West Campus.

However, when the administration claims tailgating is no longer feasible, why do Temple and Penn State continue to allow tailgating? The fight continues . . .

When the administration can find money for pet faculty projects, why cannot they make tuition affordable? The fight continues . . .

Together, we can challenge this institution and change it. We must continue the fight.

STEVE CIARROCCA

Hi, I'm Steve Ciarrocca, my friends call me Coco (that's short for coconut-head). I'm a senior education major from Westfield, N.J. and actually a very gentle and sensitive kind of guy. I love to sleep and play lacrosse or Nintendo, but I hate to go to class (perhaps this is because I may spend the next 30 years teaching one).

When I am not eating pizza or Chicken McNuggets, I can often be found at the Rusty Nail with my Pi Kappa Alpha brothers. For a good laugh, ask me about the time I had a date with my ultimate dream girl and took her to my favorite restaurant . . . White Castle. Once you get to know me, you'll realize that not only do me and my dog Mookie act very much the same, but also that I am one of the world's biggest Alf fans.

Science-fiction writer tries realism

By ROBERT DUGGAN
Staff Reporter

One man's obsession with a river is the focus of J.G. Ballard's new novel, The Day of Creation.

J.G. Ballard is one of the most influential writers of the past few decades. Born in Shanghai in 1930, he has written 19 books while residing primarily in England.

Ballard, although mainly a science-fiction writer, is best known for his more realistic novel, Empire of the Sun, which was made into a highly acclaimed film last year by Steven Stielberg. The Day of Creation is another realistic novel that retains much of the science-fiction style of Ballard as Empire of the Sun did.

The novel is set in Central Africa in a fictional town named Port-la-Nouvvelle, "a land as close to nowhere as the planet could provide." Working at a World Health Organization clinic in the town is Dr. Mallory, the narrator of the book. Mallory is also in charge of an irrigation project for the dying town. Finding nothing but sand at the bottom of his wells, Mallory dreams of discovering a "third Nile" that will make the land live again.

While he is trying to find water, the country itself is involved in a minor civil war. General Harare, leader of the rebels against the local government, opposes the irrigation project and the rebirth of the land. He wishes Mallory dead. Captain Kagwa, local police chief, is a corrupt official fighting Harare's rebels and cares equally little whether Mallory lives or dies.

One day an oak tree is dislodged by a tractor and a trickle of water begins to flow. This trickle soon becomes a full fledged river that is named after its "creator," Mallory. The man Mallory soon begins to identify himself with the River Mallory.

First seeing it as a blessing, he quickly sees it as a curse. "I felt as if I had conjured up, not just this miniature river that would irrigate the southern edge of the Sahara, but the entire consumer goods economy, which would one day smother the landscape in high rises, hypermarkets and massage parlours," he says before setting off in a stolen ferry to destroy the river at its true source in the Massif du Tondo mountains.

Mallory is joined in his journey up the river by Noon, a silent native girl who is also infatuated with the river, but in a way more primal than Mallory.

They are later joined by Professor Sanger, a documentary filmmaker who is escaping from Kagwa and who wishes to use the river for his own ends. Ballard writes, "Sanger's pseudo-scientific prattle assumed that television's flattering revision of nature was an act of creation as significant as the original invention of this great river and its abundant life." Sanger's plastic, television world and Mallory's primal, natural world vie for the mind of the silent Noon throughout the journey.

As they pass down the river, the wildlife becomes less and less developed, less complex, as if they were traveling backwards through evolution toward the very day of creation on their way to the source of the Mallory.

Ballard's depiction of Mallory's obsession with the river is fantastic. Mallory both passionately hates and loves the river he has identified with so completely. Ballard wonderfully and believably balances these two emotions within the heart of Mallory.

It is, however, ultimately Ballard's unique, fantasy-filled style that makes this book so enjoyable. The visual descriptions sensuously and hypnotically bring the African wilderness to life. At times, however, this descriptive style becomes tedious in its metaphors and absurd beyond the confines of Ballard's very black humor. His failures, however, are outnumbered by his many successes and are an acceptable price to pay considering the ambitiousness of the form.

The Day of Creation is indicative of the gifts of J.G. Ballard as both science-fiction writer and realistic writer by its joining of the two spheres in this artistically successful marriage. Everyone interested in modern fiction should become aquainted with J.G. Ballard, and The Day of Creation is an excellent way to do so.

Record Roundup . . . Joan Armatrading's album

The Shouting Stage
Joan Armatrading

As usual, the latest release from Joan Armatrading is a good chance for music fans unfamiliar with her talent to become acquainted with her style. The Shouting Stage is literally loaded with material to showcase all of Armatrading's talents from singer to songwriter to musician.

Armatrading's talents as a guitar player are evident in the solo that she gives in the opening track "The Devil I Know." Her amazing vocal talent is apparent in every single song, showing why, even after 15 years in the business, she is still one of the most respected practicing female vocalists around. This is all beside the fact that she wrote every song that appears on the album, some of which are staggering compositions.

There is an adequate amount of both upbeat, sensual songs and slower, more mysterious melodies. If you listen closely on "Did I Make You?" you can hear the guitar work of none other than Mark Knopfler of Dire Straits, who also plays on the title track.

This all should give those who are not familiar with Joan Armatrading some idea of what she is all about. So put aside Tracy Chapman, Natalie Merchant, and Suzanne Vega for a second and discover Joan Armatrading. If you are already among those who know, then she will once again please you.

Athlete of the Week

JEFF DINGLE

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is Jeff Dingle.

Dingle, a tailback for the Villanova football team, carried the ball 19 times for 166 yards in a win over Bucknell on Saturday. The total was a career high.

Dingle also scored his first career touchdown on a 49-yard run in the second quarter.

Dingle leads Villanova in yardage gained with 196 total yards this season. He is currently averaging 7.5 yards per attempt and 98 yards a game.

outdoor or indoor titles and holds collegiate records in the 3000-meter, mile and 1500-meter events.

The milestone, however, that seems to tell the most about this phenomenal athlete occurred at the last NCAA indoor championships. Not only did Huber become the first woman to capture both the mile and 3000-meter events, she did so with less than an hour between races. To accomplish a feat like that requires a great deal more than natural athletic ability.

Standing 5'6" and weighing but 110 pounds, Huber's appearance cannot not exactly be described as tough and intimidating. In short, there is a lot more to Huber than her petite stature would indicate.

She hails from Wilmington, Delaware, where she was born and raised. Not only has she excelled in the athletic world, but she also touts a 3.52 grade point average in one of the more difficult programs of academic study that the University has to offer.

These accomplishments have earned her a spot on the GTE/CoSIDA Academic All-America first team and portray her as a "true" student-athlete, a phrase often misused in today's society.

Huber has proven that the motivation and hard work needed to be a success athletically can also be harnessed toward academic endeavors as well. A point, though not properly so, which has become tarnished in college athletics today. It seems only right for someone with her priorities so focused to represent the United States in Seoul.

It would probably require a supernatural effort for Huber to bring home the gold. Most experts do not even give her much of a chance to receive any kind of medal.

But one thing is for certain, Huber will not let herself or anyone at Villanova down when she competes next week in Korea. Her mere presence in the games is a symbol of what amateur athletics are supposed to be about.

managed to score when Carl Agnelli scored from two yards out. It was not enough, however, as V.U. won.

Schulz threw for 244 yards on 21 completions while Karoly caught four passes while rushing for 29 yards.

"This was a positive win for us. It was one we really needed," Talley said of his Cats, who just began a heavy schedule of I-AA teams.

The Yankee Conference games begin in two weeks when the Wildcats travel to north to play Boston University. "The Boston University game will be a big game for us," Talley said.

"It marks our beginning of the Yankee Conference for real. We want to make a name for ourselves, and we can start on that track with the Boston game."

Tennis goes 1-2 despite injuries

By NANCY CUTTITA
Staff Reporter

The women's tennis team opened their 1988 fall season strongly with a shutout victory against Towson State. With the return of captain Laura Smelas, and some hopeful newcomers, the team looks more promising than ever.

Following their successful opening, the Wildcats stumbled a bit, losing to Mount St. Mary's and West Virginia. According to Head Coach Robert Langran, the team's setbacks can be attributed to the loss of two key players. "Our two-year starter, Stacie Hall, has not been able to play due to a bad back injury and this hurt the team's performance. Our captain, Laura Smelas, got sick during the Mount St. Mary's match and had to retire. Perhaps if Laura was able to play singles in the West Virginia match we might have won."

Commenting on her performance, Smelas stated, "It was very disappointing, but I could not go on any further. It was a close match, and the team gave a respectable showing at all three matches."

Coach Langran proudly boasts of the success of junior Lynn Slowinski, who has won all three matches. At this point, Lynn holds the team's best record. Two other promising netters to watch are Sue Bernardi and Kristina Maxwell.

The Wildcats eagerly look forward to hosting the P.A.I.A.W. Division I Tournament on Sunday. Though last year's champion Lehigh will not be in attendance, V.U. will still be challenged by local rivals Drexel, St. Joseph's and West Chester.

"Villanova should do very well since we placed only second to Lehigh in previous years and this year, due to a conflict, Lehigh will not be competing," said Coach Langran.

The team is confident and improving each day with its many newcomers this year. "We are a young team," commented Smelas, "and we are doing extremely well so far. The new players are a great asset to the team."

The P.A.I.A.W. Tournament will hopefully help the Wildcats regain their winning form. Following the tourney the team will travel to Swarthmore for a match on Monday.

Volleyball starts 1-2

By ROB SHERSHILLACKS
Staff Reporter

The women's volleyball squad finished 1-2 in last week's Syracuse tournament. First they belted Seton Hall on Sept. 9 but fell to Syracuse and Rhode Island on Sept. 10.

Opening their '88 campaign against northern foe Seton Hall, the Cats, led by Andrea Perez and Hillary Anderson, topped the Pirates, 3-0. Perez, a sophomore, recorded six kills while Anderson, a junior, played a superb floor game as Villanova's setter.

In the Wildcats 3-1 loss to the Orangemen, Lisa Stephanovic and Karen Fraser combined for 18 kills, but it was not enough as Villanova was handed their first loss of the '88 season.

The Cats were finally eliminated from the tourney when they were topped by the overpowering Rams of Rhode Island.

Next for V.U. is the William and Mary tournament which will take place this weekend at William and Mary. The tournament consists of the host Indians, Villanova, Loyola and Virginia.

On the Ball

By JOHN F. SWIFT
Assistant Sports Editor

With the opening ceremonies of the Summer Olympic Games here at last, some questions will finally be answered.

For instance, is there any conceivable way that these games can possibly live up to the expectations or the monstrous media coverage associated with them?

Will these games be able to produce the hero that the average American can relate to and that NBC needs to boost its ratings? And, will the International Olympic Committee regret ever having the games in the political nightmare of South Korea?

It will be extremely difficult for these games to be anything but disappointing to the average American. Not only will NBC provide more television coverage than ever before, but the rest of the media seems to feel that they have to get a "piece" of this extravaganza as well.

For example, the USA Today will provide a daily bonus section devoted entirely to the games. I think the games are a fantastic event, but there can be too much of a good thing.

If the United States, for instance, could produce something like the 1980 Hockey team or a Bruce Jenner from 1976, this massive media blitz might not be considered saturation. Since many of the sports featured in the games are not ones which the average American can easily identify with, a little drama must surface in order to captivate the nation.

The emergence of either an underdog or a "Cinderella story" would serve this purpose well and could be a key to the ultimate success of these games from an American standpoint.

In recent years, though not rightly so, the Olympics have become more and more of a political issue. This point is evidenced by the boycotts and protests that have become an apparently integral part of the games.

It is hard to believe that this year will mark the first time that the United States and the Soviet Union will compete together in the Summer Olympics in over 12 years.

With all these facts so glaringly evident, one has to question why the IOC would even consider having the games in a political hotbed like South Korea. Call me paranoid, but I wouldn't be too excited about the prospect of going there as an athlete or a spectator.

Let us hope that a catastrophe like the one in Munich in 1972 does not occur this year.

Despite the drawbacks and uncertainties that surround these games, I still believe that they serve as an excellent symbol of peace and justice.

The idea of having all the nations of the world assembled together for a few weeks of healthy athletic competition, allows us to forget about the problems of the world for a little while and try to imagine what world peace would be like. I just hope that these games do not bring about more harm than good to the nations and athletes competing.

Football captures first win

By DOUG SCANCARELLA
Sports Editor

Optimism is such a vital part of winning. Nobody knows that better than Villanova Head Football Coach Andy Talley and his team.

After the Cat's 31-11 loss to Wake Forest last week on opening day Talley said, "This was a tremendous game for our program. I do not regret scheduling this game."

That optimism, expressed by Talley, trickled down through the entire team and resulted in a 30-17 drubbing of Bucknell last Saturday in Lewisberg, PA.

"We were not down after the Wake Forest game," Talley said. "We realized we played a top ACC team."

So 'Nova's attitude was good going into the Bucknell game, but at first glance it did not appear that way. The Wildcats started off sluggishly.

The Bison drove the length of the field on their first drive and scored on a Steve Weiss nine-yard run. The Cats then fumbled on the following possession.

"I was a bit uneasy in the first quarter. We did not come into the game with the same emotion that we had in the Wake Forest game and we fell behind early," Talley said. "Eventually, we got into it and took control. When we had the lead at the end of the first half I felt the game was in our hands."

When the Wildcats did get into the game they were virtually unstoppable. After scoring two touchdowns in the second quarter, the Cats scored on every possession in the second half as they topped their first Division 1-AA opponent of 1988.

'Nova began rolling early in the second quarter. After taking the ball on their own six-yard line V.U. drove down the field, primarily on Jeff Dingle and Pete Lombardi runs, as well as Kirk Schulz to Jim Cashman passes. The drive culminated on the ninth play when Dingle ran around the left end, followed a crushing James Donaway block, and sprinted 49 yards for V.U.'s first score.

Dingle, a red-shirted sophomore tailback, picked up 166 yards on 19 carries in the contest. "Jeff had a magnificent performance," Talley said. "He distinguished himself as our number one tailback." Dingle was complimented by Lombardi, a senior, who ran for 82 yards.

The Bison responded to Dingle's run with a field goal, but Villanova came right back. After senior linebacker Rich Spugnardi, who came up with seven tackles in the affair, picked off his first of two interceptions, V.U. drove again.

This drive, which was highlighted by two long catch and carries by Ron Sency, was capped off by a Schulz to John Karoly nine-yard touchdown pass. Nova had a 14-10 advantage heading into the half.

Villanova dominated the second half as they cruised to their first victory of 1988. In that half Tom Withka capped off three drives with field goals (28, 19 and 22 yards) while Lombardi capped off another drive with a touchdown from one yard out. Bucknell put together a drive of their own and

Field Hockey ties

As the game started, it appeared to be a normal field hockey match, but it quickly transformed into a long, bitter, defensive war. Lafayette's aggressiveness caught Villanova by surprise.

As Head Coach Cheryl Massaro commented, "I didn't expect them [Lafayette] to play that hard."

The skirmish, taking place on Sept. 7th, was eventually called a tie, when after two overtime periods, the score remained 0-0. The game was Wildcat goalie Mary Monahan's 14th career shutout which tied the school record.

During the first period, Lafayette's offense was solid and unyielding. The Leopards were able to retain control of the ball throughout most of the playing time, and they attempted 13 goal shots while the Cats tried only four. However, the strong Villanova defense kept Lafayette off the scoreboard.

The Leopards maintained possession during the second period and outshot the Wildcats by a margin of three to one, but the Cats' defense remained alert. Monahan registered seven saves and lent guidance to this year's young defensive squad.

Massaro, speaking on Villanova's defensive play, said, "We have a young team this year on defense, and our offense should typically be our strong squad this season." Yet the reverse proved true in this match.

Wildcat hopes rose with 26:12 left in the game, as 'Nova forward Sharon Seiz broke free and charged upfield. She avoided the Lafayette defenders and took what could have been the winning shot, but the strong stroke veered wide to the right.

Villanova fans were on the edge of their seats as the Leopards tried to convert at least one of their five second period penalty shots into a goal, but all the attempts were unsuccessful and regulation play ended with the score 0-0.

Villanova's offense gained control during the first overtime period and had several strong shots on the Lafayette goal.

With 3:02 remaining, Villanova brought the ball within a couple of feet of the Lafayette goal. A scuffle for the ball arose among the opposing players and it seemed as though the ball was going in but at the last minute, a Lafayette defender knocked it away. Both teams failed to score in the remaining time and a second overtime period began.

The players looked weary as the final ten minutes began. Each team was able to attempt four goals shots, but every shot was either wide or blocked by a defender. The last seconds ticked away, and the final score was 0-0.

"We just didn't want it bad enough," said Massaro. "We're good enough to win this year, if we can just pull it all together."

Soccer shuts out foes

Sporting a stingy defense and an improving offense, the Wildcat Men's soccer team defeated Mount Saint Mary's and tied a strong LaSalle team in double overtime.

"We've given up one goal in 290 minutes of play," mentioned Head Coach Chris Jones in reference to his team's fine defensive performances.

This defense produced two more shutouts this week. Against LaSalle on Sept. 7, senior stopper Jim Cowan and junior sweeper Joe Reteneller once again anchored the Wildcat defense. Sophomore Mike Deegan nearly tallied the tie-breaking goal late in the game. However, his strong shot deflected off the post. The game ended in a scoreless tie.

The 'Cats then met Mount Saint Mary's on Sept. 10. Led by two goals by freshman Steve Raffellini, Villanova edged Mount Saint Mary's, 2-0.

Coach Jones was pleased with this offensive production. Midfielder Steve Grello also offered a strong performance in this game.

The Wildcats now own a record of 1-1-1. "Every game is a big one from now to the end of the season," commented Coach Jones.

Their next match-up against Seton Hall not only is their Big East opener, but also will probably be one of their toughest games of the season. The Pirates are ranked eighth in the nation and first in the region. Later in the week, the Wildcats will travel to Haverford College for a game.

The team appears optimistic about their chances for a successful season. They have been pleased by the way they have played, primarily on defense. This confidence should bring the Wildcats continued luck in their Big East endeavors.

Closkey concedes election to Lewis

By KEVIN C. HEIL
Assistant News Editor

Despite lacking a majority, John Lewis became the new Student Government president Tuesday after his nearest competitor, Sean Closkey, conceded.

If Closkey had not conceded, a run-off election would have been held between Lewis and Closkey yesterday, since neither candidate received the majority necessary for victory.

Election Commissioner Jim Rizzo said 667 votes were cast. Lewis received 292 votes, Closkey received 189 votes and Steve Ciarrocca garnered 186 votes. 334 votes were necessary for victory, Rizzo said.

"I'm pleased it's over," Lewis said. "I'm happy I have the opportunity to serve the Villanova community. I'm looking forward to taking over the reins and ... [building] Student Government into a formidable force this year."

Lewis said Closkey "did what he felt was in the best interest of the Student Government. It wouldn't have bothered me at all had he decided to run [in the run-off election] ... He's a good guy."

Closkey said he conceded because "it's best for the University. We don't need another election." He added that he was not disappointed and it was time to "start making some headway on the issues. We've got an excellent candidate in John Lewis."

"It [running for president] was fun," said Ciarrocca. "We didn't mean to offend anybody. We just feel that the students don't have enough say and we don't think the administration gives the Student Government enough of a voice."

Phil Brach, current Student Government president, said, "I think it was very admirable that Sean declined running. I'd like to believe it was for the best of the [Student Government] not to have to go through another election."

Closkey and Terise Fusco ran in an April presidential election. However, both were cited for campaign violations and the results were nullified.

I'm pleased it's over. I'm looking forward to taking over the reins and . . . (building) Student Government into a formidable force this year.

John Lewis
Student Government president-elect

Brach's term as president ends Oct. 7, he said. "It will be a very smooth transition," he added.

Rizzo said he was content with the voter turnout but had hoped that more students would have participated in the election. He said there were no campaign violations and added that Closkey's decision to concede was "a very honorable thing to do."

Acquaintance rape emerges from shadows

By NOEL E. FALCO
and JENNIFER REIDY
News Editors

"Although largely hidden ... acquaintance rape is the most prevalent rape crime there is," according to a Sept. 4 article in the Philadelphia Inquirer, which cites that 70 to 80 percent of all rapes are acquaintance rapes.

Date rape, or acquaintance rape, is "sexual assault against a woman that's committed by someone the victim knows," as defined by a pamphlet distributed by the University Counseling Center. Contrary to popular belief, the typical rapist is not the "psychotic stranger lurking in an alley" that women have been trained to fear and to defend themselves against.

He is often a classmate, acquaintance, date, boss, co-worker, family member, neighbor or even a boyfriend, according to the pamphlet. Because of the relationship between the rapist and the victim, date rape is rarely reported and is thus still surrounded in its own mythology. Oftentimes, neither the man nor the woman realizes a rape has been committed.

Most rapes on college campuses are acquaintance rapes, according to Melanie Sallie, community education and training director at the Philadelphia office of Women Organized Against Rape [WOAR].

Sallie said that although rape crisis centers have been aware of the problem for a long time because it is one of the most prevalent forms of rape, it has become a "hot topic" as it has become a more public issue.

Recently, date rape has become the topic of interest in the media, particularly in television programs, magazine articles and even movies. A currently aired "After-school Special" on ABC-TV dealt with the controversial issue, articles have been recently released by the Inquirer and College Press Service, and a special segment was aired on CBS-TV last year.

"The truth about rape — that it usually happens between people who know each other and is often committed by 'regular' guys — is harder to accept," the Inquirer article observed.

The fact is, the article notes, that the risk of a woman being raped by someone she knows is four times greater than that of being raped by a stranger.

In answer to the question "How common is acquaintance rape?" the Inquirer cited statistics from a survey of college campuses taken by Ms. magazine.

"Of 3,187 women questioned, one in four had had an experience that met the legal definition of

Inauguration unprecedented

University Press Release

The week of Oct. 2 will be "Inaugural Week" on campus, commemorating the inauguration of the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., as the University's new president.

The principal inaugural ceremonies will take place on Wednesday, Oct. 5. Classes have been suspended on that day and employee work schedules have been relaxed so that all members of the campus community can participate in the historic events.

One reading day has been designated a class day in order to make up for the missed classes.

Also participating will be representatives of other educational institutions, members of learned societies, government officials, members of the Board of Trustees and friends and neighbors of the University.

Presidential inaugurations are major events in the life and history of a university. Dobbin, 52, was chosen in June as the successor to the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., who retired last month after serving as Villanova's president for 13 years.

This is the first time in its 146-year history that Villanova has had a major presidential inaugural.

On Oct. 5, the day will begin at 10 a.m. with a concelebrated Mass by Dobbin and four previous presidents of the Universitv in the 100-year-old St. Thomas of Villanova Chapel.

Joining Dobbin in the concelebration will be the Rev. Francis X.N. McGuire, O.S.A., Villanova's president from 1944 to 1954; the Rev. Robert J. Welsh, O.S.A., who headed the University from 1967 to 1971; the Rev. Edward J. McCarthy, O.S.A., president from 1971 to 1975; and Driscoll.

The Rev. Michael J. Scanlon, O.S.A., a member of the University's Board of Trustees and former colleague of Dobbin's at the Washington Theological Union, will be principal speaker for the inaugural Mass, which is intended for the campus community and invited guests.

Following a series of receptions and luncheons, the formal installation of the new president will take place at 3 p.m. in the duPont Pavilion. Many of the visiting dignitaries, clad in colorful academic garb, will march in the opening processional.

Controversial theologian to lecture at University

By CHRISTINE E. ATKINS
Staff Reporter

The Rev. Charles E. Curran, S.T.D., controversial former professor of moral theology at Catholic University of America, will lecture at Villanova Nov. 13, said Dr. Walter Conn, religious studies professor.

Conn said the religious studies department chose Curran to participate in the lecture series because he is considered "one of the major Catholic theologians" today.

Curran will speak on "Academic Freedom and Catholic Higher Education."

Curran received national exposure recently when he was suspended by the Vatican from Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C. The Vatican criticized Curran for teaching liberal vews on birth control, homosexuality, abortion and divorce.

Curran, the author of over 15 books exploring moral theology and the modern concerns of the church's role in ethics, was declared unfit to teach in the church's name in 1986 directly by Rome. About one-third of the trustees at Catholic University of America voted that Curran was competent to teach moral theology, but not at a Vatican-chartered graduate theology school.

Conn said that Curran has raised some questions and opinions which are frequently not compatible with the official Church doctrines. In particular, there exists a "clear cut difference" between his views on contraception and abortion and the official Church ruling.

In order to teach at Catholic University of America or another Vatican-chartered school, Curran would have to teach only specific Catholic theology.

Herein lies what Curran has seen as the conflict at hand and the specific question he raises in his discourse on academic freedom at the higher levels of Catholic education.

Conn described Curran's conflict as being whether theologians within the universities should be allowed some space to explore the present debates on Church doctrine with the objective of reaching truth.

In his 1986 book, "Faithful Dissent," Curran addresses the struggle with a "creative fidelity" to the "word and work of Jesus" at a Catholic university.

Seeing the theologian as a person independent of the hierarchical teaching office, Curran asks in his book, "Is a Catholic university a contradiction in terms?

"Colleges have stressed the importance of institutional autonomy and academic freedom as two essential characteristics of what constitutes a college ... can and should Catholic theology be responsibly taught and researched in context of academic freedom and institutional autonomy?"

Curran said that academic freedom entails a freedom to pursue truth, "with no limits placed on scholars other than truth, honesty and competency."

Curran will speak at 8 p.m. in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center and admission to the lecture is free.

Sullivan campaign continues

By ROGER B. McCURDY II
Staff Reporter

Ed Sullivan, associate director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education, is continuing his campaign efforts as the Democratic candidate for state senator from District 17 of Pennsylvania.

Sullivan is running against Republican incumbent Richard A. Tilghman, who has held the position of state senator for the last 20 years, in the general election on Nov. 8.

The 17th district includes part of West Philadelphia, Haverford Township, Radnor Township, Lower Merion Township, Bridgeport, Plymouth, Springfield and Conshohocken.

The district is primarily Republican, but according to Sullivan, the difference between the two political parties will not play as large a role in this situation as in national elections.

"At this level we are talking about [having] the right approach to government," said Sullivan. He said the voters are the government, and should accordingly have a representative who is open to their concerns and needs.

During this campaign Sullivan has returned to what he has called "old style" politics. It consists of meeting one-on-one with people, both in their private homes and in busy public places.

People responded well to this approach, according to Sullivan, who said he feels that although people want to be close to government, they often feel alienated from it.

"This [campaign] is not just about a person," said Sullivan, "this is about some important issues." Sullivan mainly bases his campaign on three issues.

Environmental protection is one of these issues. Sullivan said environmental concerns are local and state problems. He cited as examples recent releases of information concerning radon contamination in private homes, along with the problems of toxic waste dumps, acid rain and the pollution of the Schuylkill River.

Another issue of Sullivan's campaign is the topic of consumer rights. Sullivan said the prices on automobile insurance in Pennsylvania are among the highest in the United States, and those around Philadelphia are among the highest in the state.

He said a solution can be found that will respect the companies' need for profit as well as keeping the price within reason for customers.

The concept of basic political services is another major issue in Sullivan's campaign. Sullivan said he believes that government is an extension of the people. He also said that an elected official must be in constant contact with the citizens of his district, whether through public meetings, news letters or office hours.

"Being state senator would be a full-time job, something I would want to dedicate myself to," said Sullivan. He said if he is elected he will still try to be available to assist the Center for Peace and Justice Education in any way possible. As an alumnus of Villanova, he said his heart still will be with the institution and the center.

Ed Sullivan, associate director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

Approximately 20 student volunteers assist the campaign by making phone calls, going door-to-door with information, doing political research and assisting in fund raising, according to Sullivan.

"As seen in past elections, college students can mean the difference in an election," said Sullivan.

Once in office, Sullivan said he plans to be a supporter of state aid for higher education, both in terms of loans and scholarships. This, Sullivan said, is a response to the national cutback in educational aid.

"We cannot allow our society to become two-tiered," said Sullivan, "those who can afford to be educated and those who can't."

Corrections

The Villanovan erred in its reporting of an alleged statement by Ed Sullivan, associate director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education, in an article last week on the Student Coalition Against Apartheid and Racism.

According to the article, Sullivan allegedly said that the main point of the University's divestment or investment is not in the money, but rather in the publicity. He allegedly suggested that it would do more good to hold a public ceremony to burn one share of stock and possibly hold a prayer service for the people of South Africa, than to quietly pull out a larger block of stock.

Sullivan did not make such a statement. The alleged statement was based on an informal conversation with former Villanova Anti-Apartheid Coalition member Mike McGinnis, which was misinterpreted by the reporter.

McGinnis said Wednesday that during the conversation he stressed the need for the University community to give public witness to its search for world justice, particularly in its response to apartheid.

Due to an editing error, two different versions of Sen. Dan Quayle's 1986 reelection were printed in a story on Quayle. Quayle was reelected to the Senate by a 61 percent margin in November 1986.

The Villanovan apologizes for the errors.

Initial Senate meeting today

University senators will concentrate on socializing and general housekeeping during their first meeting today at 4 p.m. in the West Lounge of Dougherty Hall.

The meeting will begin with a social hour. Also, senators will choose an executive secretary for the academic year.

The meeting will be the first one held with the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., as University president. Dr. Philip A. Maurone, physics professor and chairman of the University Senate, said that Dobbin is both "very efficient" and "very supportive of the Senate." Dobbin expressed in a letter to Maurone his intention "to support and cooperate with the Senate in its future endeavors."

Student Senators Diane Carman and Christine Wnuk are both looking forward to Dobbin's presidency. Wnuk said, "I'm excited to have him here."

Carman said, "I'm looking forward to working under Fr. Dobbin. It should be an inferesting transition."

On the agenda is the announcement of the standing committee appointments. These appointments were made at the Senate's Executive Committee meeting on Sept. 8.

The resignation of Senator Joseph Thompson at the end of the last semester has left an opening for an Arts Senate faculty seat. Thompson resigned because of other commitments.

Senators speak of new term

By MAUREEN STAPLETON

University Senators expressed optimism about working with new University President, the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., as they looked ahead to a new term.

Coeducational residence halls, an issue that was examined in the Senate last semester, is currently being studied by Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life. Dobbin charged Neville with this responsibility following the Senate's recommendation last year. He included the stipulation that the report be completed by December.

Christine Wnuk, student senator from the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, said the fact that Dobbin placed a time limit on the report was "a good first sign."

Dr. Philip A. Maurone, chairmen of the University Senate, said that the time limit on the report was a good sign of things to come. He said, "This is what Fr. Dobbin wants. He wants a deadline. That's his prerogative."

Diane Carman, student senator from the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, said, "I think in a college experience it is important to have coeducational housing ... at other schools they have proven it is beneficial."

Bush, Dukakis on day care

Bush offers refunds, tax credits

By HALLIE ZIMMERMAN
Staff Reporter

As the cost of living increases, more women join the work force and single-parent families become more common, the issue of how to implement a comprehensive national day-care program has become an issue in the presidential campaign.

Presidential nominees Gov. Michael Dukakis and Vice President George Bush have announced support for federal child-care proposals. However, "they are completely separate philosophies," said Deborah Steelman, director of domestic policy for the Bush campaign, to the Washington Post recently.

On July 24, during an address to the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Bush outlined his four-point child-care program.

The overall format is planned to counter the Act for Better Child Care Services co-sponsored by Sen. Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.) and Rep. Dave Kildee (D-Mich.). This bill uses federal funds to create and regulate day-care centers within each state.

Thomas Mann, director of governmental studies at the Brookings Institute, explained that by avoiding a new federal bureaucracy, a middle-class entitlement and discrimination against families in which the mother stays home, Bush's proposal is designed "in a distinctly Republican way," according to the Post article.

The first and main element of the program would be a $1,000 tax refund, which would be available to families with children under age 4 in which at least one parent works. The tax credit would be given immediately to families earning between $8,000 and $12,000 annually. This section costs $1.5 billion and would "phase in" families earning up to $20,000 over a four-year period.

"The fundamental problem with that is that it is not enough money," said Dr. Brian Jones, Villanova sociology professor. He explained that $1,000 is "woefully inadequate." He said he annually pays $6,500 for day-care.

Median parental expenditures for child care are currently approximately $2,000 a year, according to the Free Congress Foundation, a Washington, D.C.-based research organization.

The second component to Bush's proposal is to maintain the existing tax credit for dependent care and to take an additional step to make it refundable. However, unlike the current dependent care credit, the proposed credit would be available to families earning too little to owe taxes. This section of the program would cost $400 million.

Encouraging more employer-sponsored day-care is the third facet of the proposal. Bush plans to provide every federal agency with federally-sponsored day care for government employees. He would allot $50 million to be used as incentives for employers and to reduce obstacles presented by lack of available liability insurance.

The fourth area of the Bush proposal focuses on more choices and better information. Bush would authorize federal resources to provide seed money for new program designs in sick child care and before- and after-school care, using educational facilities in innovative and productive ways.

With the $2.2 billion allocated to this last area, Bush would encourage day-care alternatives such as educational components, work schedules, benefit plans, consumer education guidance and information and referral services.

Bush may have best summarized his philosophy of child care in an address in July.

"Years ago, some may have viewed child care as a special and limited need. Today, child care is nothing short of a family necessity. And because of that clear truth, I am proposing a set of policies that enables families — not government — to decide the right approach for themselves," he said.

Dukakis for federal program

By DANIEL MORIARITY

Democratic presidential nominee Gov. Michael Dukakis endorses "in concept" legislation for a federally subsidized, federally regulated child care program for the children of working parents.

Sen. Christopher Dodd (D—Conn.) and Rep. Dale Kildee (D—Mich.) sponsored the Act for Better Child Care Services [ABC] in response to the recent dramatic increase in the number of double-income and single-parent homes in recent years.

The bill would allocate $2.5 billion its first year to help states purchase child care for families who earn up to 115 percent of each state's median income. In addition, states would provide a 20 percent match in funding.

Children from low-income families would be given priority for services under the ABC legislation.

Religious institutions' day care programs would be eligible for aid "if they did not include worship or other religious activities," according to a July issue of the Washington Post.

Opponents of the ABC bill propose targeting only low-income families for aid.

The bill's "failure to mandate an educational component of day care" was cited by Robert Wright of the New Republic in August.

Furthermore, opponents claim the bill discriminates against mothers not in the work force and against families whose relatives care for their children because the requisite licensing for day care instructors might deter them.

Dukakis has not said from what source funding for the program would come.

Democrats maintain Dukakis is "flexible" on funding while Republicans claim his position is ambiguous.

"Both candidates are avoiding the specifics, intentionally," said Dr. Matthew Kerbel, political science professor at Villanova. Kerbel cited the 1984 presidential campaign, in which candidates frequently lost votes whenever specific positions were taken.

According to a recent Time article, 57 percent of those with children under age 6 work.

Twelve percent of mothers place their children in child care that could be described as a "facility," an "institution" or a "center," according to conservative Phyllis Schlafly.

Although politicians agree that funding is necessary, the Democratic approach provides health, safety and worker salary standards at the federal and state level that Republican presidential nominee George Bush's plan circumvents.

The ABC bill has wide support among Democrats, even though they discuss differences over education, religion, and funding within the legislation.

Massachusetts campuses plagued by troubles

By College Press Service

If he is elected president in November, Gov. Michael Dukakis will take with him education policies that have left students in Massachusetts with more financial aid and campuses with more buildings, but that have also gotten the state's public colleges in deep budget troubles.

This fall, for example, some schools are turning away students, replacing teachers with computers and raising tuition 8.5 percent — a higher price hike than the national average of 4 percent — to cope with deep budget cuts.

In general, the Dukakis administration has been both a boon and a bust for colleges and universities.

The boons have been considerable: since beginning his second term in 1962, after a four-year absence from the governor's office and a stint teaching at Harvard, Dukakis has raised student aid, faculty salaries and the budgets of other programs on public campuses to promote his high tech agenda for the state's economy.

As the federal government reduced aid to students, the Dukakis administration picked up the slack: since 1983 the state's scholarship fund, for example, jumped from $19 million to $84 million.

Earlier in 1988, moreover, Dukakis signed legislation to initiate more than $400 million in massive construction, maintenance and repair projects on several campuses, a bill that was a top priority for education officials.

"I think we were treated reasonably fairly," said Franklyn Jenifer, chancellor of the Board of Regents of Higher Education.

Yet Massachusetts students and administrators maintain they are frustrated by what they see as a bias toward private institutions, by scandals that pushed several campus presidents out of jobs and by Dukakis's failure to maintain adequate operations budgets for state colleges.

Jenifer, for one, said operating budget cuts have almost paralyzed the state higher education system.

Public campuses will receive $638 million this year, $21.3 million less than last year. Current operating budgets are "not conducive to maintaining programs," Jenifer said.

Fitchberg State President Vincent Mara called the reductions the most severe blow to public institutions since the state's fiscal crisis during Dukakis' first term in 1975.

Several schools say they will accept fewer students this year because of financial woes. To save money, they will cut back on teaching assistants, freeze faculty hiring and tap maintenance funds to try to provide the same level of services as last year.

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst, the state's flagship public university with more than 20,000 undergraduates, is charging students a special one-time $220 fee to raise emergency cash.

Students throughout the state public system face an 8.5 percent tuition hike in the coming year and a substantial increase in dormitory fees.

Many University of Lowell students will receive instruction from computers, instead of faculty members, in order to cut costs. Those students will have to pay a $100 fee to use computer labs.

"Without the faculty we have to do something," said President William T. Hogan.

It could get worse. State campus budgets, Dukakis said during a March hearing on college savings bonds, "cannot be expected to continue to grow at anything like the rate they have over the past few years."

Some students, however, are upset most by Dukakis's support of a measure that would allow schools to keep excess revenues generated by tuition hikes. The "tuition retention" plan, student leaders say, encourages colleges to raise their prices.

"We all think he's not sensitive enough," said Michael Ferrigno, director of the State Student Association of Massachusetts. "It pains us. This policy, we believe, is really a Republican policy."

And Vincent McGrath, president of the State College Faculty Association and a Salem State College professor, said tuition increases are often determined by what private colleges charge, even though private schools "can't keep their own costs down."

McGrath also said he thinks Dukakis tends to bow to the traditional dominance of private colleges in Massachusetts.

"We aren't California, we're not Texas and we're not Michigan," Dukakis said during a 1986 Boston Globe interview. "We do happen to have some of the finest [private] institutions in the world. And I don't think it makes sense for us to duplicate that [by building up public colleges]."

The remark infuriated many educators and students.

Professors travel to Alabama to assist in national survey

Survey focuses on criminal reform

By E.H. McELDOWNEY
Staff Reporter

Seven Villanova professors journeyed to Alabama yesterday to assist in conducting a national survey on prison reform and prison overcrowding.

The faculty members will be traveling to Birmingham, Mobile and Montgomery in order to poll reaction to the issues of alternate forms of criminal reform.

The professors included Dr. John Carvahlo, Dr. John A. Doody and Dr. John Immerwahr of the philosophy department, and Dr. Joseph DesJardins and Ed Sullivan of the Center for Peace and Justice Education. Dr. Teresa Nance of the communication arts department and Dr. Michael E. Burke, director of the Honors program, also assisted.

Immerwahr has been personally involved with the project in the past.

Several of these professors participated in a similar survey in January in the cities of Baltimore, Nashville, San Antonio and Seattle. The previous project involved polling the public on aspects of United States and Soviet Union relations.

The project is being run by the Public Agenda Foundation, a nonprofit research and education organization founded by former Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, public opinion analyst Daniel Yankelovich and the Center for Foreign Policy Development at Brown University.

The topic of the program is "Criminal Justice, Prison Systems and Prison Overcrowding." It presents five alternatives to the current system of probation or imprisonment, according to Doody.

The professors were hired to be part of a Human Organization Science [HOS] Institute team in running the poll. Doody said that HOS is made up of people from many backgrounds. Not all are social scientists.

The group is involved in taking polls, unlike the Gallup poll which uses telephone questions, but through a two-hour program.

Doody said this pool is being conducted because "the United States Supreme Court found 35 out of 50 states in violation of the Constitution concerning cruel and unusual punishment." Prison overcrowding was cited as cruel and unusual and so states must find a way to relieve the problem, said Doody.

Doody said the survey discusses five alternatives to building more prisons or releasing more prisoners, the two traditional solutions to overcrowding.

The survey begins with a pre-test, given to a group of people chosen at random. The groups, however, are screened to represent the demographic make-up of the state in regard to age, sex, race and education.

After the test, those surveyed view a film which presents five alternatives to the current prison system of imprisonment or probation.

Doody said the first alternative is strict probation, which involves unannounced visits by a probation officer. The probation system now has the person on probation reporting to his officer once a month.

The second alternative includes a combination of strict probation and community service.

The third alternative is strict probation and financial restitution.

House arrest is the fourth alternative presented. This would either be a constant in-house arrest, or the person could leave to work. Either way, the person would be under electronic surveillance.

The final alternative is a boot-camp prison situation. Doody said this is a "Marine-style" camp for discipline and exercise.

After the film, there is a 75-minute discussion between those being polled. This is where professors will play a role.

Doody said they lead the discussion and promote conversation on the issues.

The final aspect of the survey is a second questionnaire testing whether reactions and opinions have changed on issues.

"We are polling to find if the public is ready for these alternatives," Doody said.

English faculty distribute academic integrity papers

By BARBARA KRESCH
Staff Reporter

The English department has distributed pamphlets about academic honesty in an attempt to correct the problem of student cheating, said Sterling F. Delano, English department chairperson, recently.

Delano said, "We consider [academic honesty] to be a very serious matter." He said the purpose of the distribution of the pamphlets by the English department is to "renew our commitment in a much more visible and effective way" in a "uniform standard for all students."

Dr. Evan Radcliffe, director of writing in the English department and the composer of the pamphlets, said the problem of academic honesty is "increasingly being seen as a problem at Villanova University ... in my experience, more a problem here than at several other schools that I have been involved with."

He continued, "Students aren't learning what they are supposed to be learning ... and when a student cheats, they break that whole sense of community that you want to exist in a classroom."

Delano said that in the past, individual English instructors may or may not have talked about plagiarism in their classes, leaving no clear-cut expectations of the students.

"Now they have something concrete and we expect that students will understand what constitutes plagiarism," said Delano.

Radcliffe said the emphasis on academic honesty is not just directed at the students, but also at the faculty. He said the faculty was given information on how to reduce the number of cases of plagiarism and how to respond to them if they occur.

"We are trying to help other departments by setting an example," said Delano. He predicted that other departments will start to make similar efforts and that "we will see, throughout the University, a united effort to address the problem."

These efforts can be seen in the University's academic integrity committee, created in the spring of last year in order to aid in solving the problem of academic dishonesty, according to Radcliffe. The committee is defining the components of academic honesty and the penalties for dishonesty for the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, said Radcliffe.

Contra war moves to video frontier

Someone is conducting an anti-war campaign against video game machines in and around the Indiana University [IU] campus.

In two calls to the Indiana Daily Student, IU's campus newspaper, an anonymous man said he vandalized a video game called "Contra" at Indiana's Memorial Center to protest the Reagan administration's "illegal and immoral human rights violations" in Central America.

He called the game an "affront to human dignity," adding he wanted to make sure no one would profit from it.

The game features Rambo-like soldiers fighting in a jungle, said Chuck Stapleton, who manages the machine in the IU Union for Bally. "It is not political in any way," he said.

Athletes' drug tests subpoenaed

A U.S. Attorney, in cooperation with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency, has subpoenaed the results of drug tests of University of Florida athletes.

This action realizes the fear of drug-testing opponents, who maintained that it would be impossible to halt the investigation, which involves a Gainesville cocaine ring.

An American Civil Liberties Union official said, "The Florida case puts this issue back on the agenda, and will help us add another privacy argument to our case."

The athletes involved in the drug probe agreed to the drug testing by signing a consent form that requires that school officials keep the results confidential.

Some of the students have hired a lawyer, Stephen Bernstein, to represent them. While many experts doubt that the results can be kept from law enforcement officials, Bernstein will argue that the subpoenas are improper and that they have not presented any evidence of any particular athlete's wrongdoing.

Sports figures indicted

Three sports agents and a professional player were indicted Aug. 24 for using illegal payments and threats to sign college athletes to representation contracts.

Agents Norby Walters and Lloyd Bloom were accused of offering cash, cars and other valuable gifts to student athletes in exchange for an agreement to represent them in professional contract negotiations.

According to U.S. Attorney Anton Valukas, these agents also threatened the athletes if the offers were not persuasive.

Bloom and Walters are charged with racketeering, mail and wire fraud, and extortion for inducing students to violate National Collegiate Athletic Association rules and to then sign affadavits saying they had not.

Leadership society obtains national charter

By SHEILA A. COURTER
Staff Reporter

The Villanova Leadership Society will receive its national charter with Omicron Delta Kappa [ODK] on Sunday. Dr. Eldridge Roarke, national vice president, will be in attendance.

ODK at Villanova initiated its first members in the spring of 1987 under the direction of Michael DeRosa, who is now director of student activities at Pratt Institute of New York.

ODK is an organization centering on student leadership and scholarship, said Corinne Kohl, president of Villanova's chapter of ODK.

Currently, ODK consists of 50 members. Membership is offered to junior and senior students, but is not restricted to undergraduates. Alumni, graduate students and faculty or administration may also be offered membership, Kohl noted.

According to Kohl, a national charter will help the organization become a more active group and set a strong foundation for the future.

ODK organized the Mini-Activities Forum that took place on Sept. 8. Its goal was to introduce the freshman class and any other interested students to the activities and organizations available at Villanova, explained Kohl.

Since the members of ODK form a diverse group of people, they were able to talk to students about all areas of involvement. Kohl said ODK would also like to offer talks and lectures on such issues as public speaking or interview skills.

The main goal of ODK is for its members to offer their experiences at Villanova and their involvement in the various organizations to other students. According to Kohl, the members are a dedicated and responsible group whose main goal is to "reach young leaders with their experience."

In order to maintain a high membership standard, the members are selected through a point system. Each chapter of ODK formulates its own point system based on the five major areas of college life established by the society, explained Kohl.

The first chapter of ODK was founded at Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Va., on Dec. 3, 1914, by 15 students and faculty. ODK was the first national college honor society received on a national level. The members based their membership on the idea of recognizing exceptional leadership qualities, according to a pamphlet on the organization titled "Omicron Delta Kappa."

By 1917, Johns Hopkins University, the University of Pittsburgh and Davidson College opened new chapters. ODK began as an all-male organization and did not become coeducational until 1974. There now exist more than 203 chapters, the pamphlet continued.

The basis for selection into ODK centers around five areas: athletics; social service and religious activities; student government; journalism and mass media; and the creative and performing arts. The office of Student Activities and advisors of the various areas nominate outstanding members from each of the five specific areas.

After the nomination process has been completed, the existing members vote on the new members. Each nominee must have a 3.0 grade point average as well, Kohl said.

Current officers of ODK are Kohl, president; Mary Jo Yannacone, vice president; David Reed, treasurer; and Chris Trowbridge, administrative secretary. The organization also possesses a either rape (15 percent) or attempted rape (11 percent).

-84 percent of those who had been raped knew their attacker.

-57 percent of the rapes happened on dates."

The article then comments, "Those figures make acquaintance rape and date rape more common than left-handedness or heart attacks or alcoholism."

One in 12 male college students polled by Ms. had committed acts that met the legal definition of rape or attempted rape.

Why does date rape occur? Some of the reasons underlying it are sex role stereotypes, poor communication, mixed messages and learned violence, according to the pamphlet. "Date rape isn't about love or lust ... date rape is sexual violence that's directed at a woman," it continues.

The Inquirer article speaks of socially acceptable, learned male behavior, or sexual indoctrination, in which men as boys are taught "to view women as objects from whom sex is taken, not as equal partners with their own desires and wishes."

It continues, "Boys learn that they must initiate sexual activity and that they may meet with resistance from girls at first, but that if they just persist, cajole and refuse to let up, they'll ultimately get what they want."

Attitude problems toward woman are common in adolescents and young adults, and are "definitely" one of the problems surrounding date rape. Males feel "strongly" that if they have paid money for a date, "they are owed sex in return," Sallie explained.

She added that members of WOAR encounter these attitudes during training programs at schools which educate students about the issue.

The Inquirer article also includes extensive research done of male attitudes toward women in terms of "a commodity" and sex as "an achievement." Due to these perceptions, some men do not realize they have committed date rape.

"The few women who dare to report being raped by a boyfriend or classmate or co-worker are still usually met with skepticism and disbelief by prosecutors, judges and jurors," according to the Inquirer.

Women do not report date rape or consider it a crime perhaps due to the fact they have invited the person into their home or accepted the date, according to Sallie.

She added that humiliation, peer pressure and fear of disbelief are factors that make it difficult for a woman to report the date rape. Feelings of self-blame are not as prevalent in stranger rape as in date rape, she noted.

"Date rape is a violation of a woman's body and spirit," explains the pamphlet. The effects of date rape on the victim include loss of trust, especially with men; guilt, even though she is not responsible for her attacker's actions; fear; depression; and sexual problems.

Sexual problems for the victim can include abstaining from sex for a time, being frightened during sex or having more sex than before the rape. Many women who were virgins before being raped feel "devalued" by their experience and may come away believing that their rape experience is what sex is supposed to be, or wondering whether sex is anything they will ever want or enjoy, noted the Inquirer.

Though counseling helps the victim cope with the situation after it happens, the only prevention of date rape is education about the attitudes and misconceptions which contribute to the problem. Sallie explained, "Education is very important ... women need to know it is a crime ...men need to know too."

Next week: A look at date rape at Villanova, including the contributing factors of alcohol and drug use, and suggested solutions to the problem.

Women's group changes name

By ANNE LOMBARDI
Staff Reporter

Students Against Sexual Stereotypes [SASS] a campus organization, is working to "raise consciousness to the stereotypes we are subject to and the roles we cast for men and women," said Cathy Hackett, one of the group's founding members.

Originally known as the Women's Society, the group felt that male students were discouraged from joining because of the name. In an effort to reach more of the campus, the name was changed to better fit the group's original purpose — to break stereotypes so that students will have more freedom to be what they want, according to Hackett.

Although it seems that many stereotypes have been done away with through the women's movement of the 1970s, Tracey Burke, another founding member, said that stereotypes are "more subtle but they still exist and they are restrictive."

Although there are more incidents of women restrained by stereotypes, men are subject to stereotypes as well, Burke noted. However, because men have dominated leadership positions, these role expectations are not obvious.

Hackett observed that in society, men are often excluded from emotional expression, expected to be the "bread-winner" and play a secondary role in child raising. Stereotypes limit both sexes from reaching full potential as leaders, in careers and in the family, she continued.

Although programs at schools like the University of Pennsylvania are much more established, SASS hopes to affect Villanova's campus through a series of lectures, films, and programs run with the University Counseling Center to help combat problems such as date rape, which appears to be linked to the stereotypes of men and women, Hackett added.

The roles of men, and especially women, have changed a great deal over the past two decades, Burke explained. More changes are expected in future years as women become more established in leadership roles in politics and in the workplace, she predicted.

She said these changes will affect not only women themselves, but their families, their co-workers and their jobs. New expectations will arise for both sexes, Burke concluded.

Organizations such as SASS hope to enable men and women to accept the changes that will occur and to do away with stereotypes that limit ability and potential. Burke said SASS hopes to be a forum for both sexes and a group that allows people to think about the roles they do not wish to play.

Interested students are encouraged to attend the weekly discussion meetings at 5 p.m. Mondays in the Center for Peace and Justice Education, in the basement of Sullivan Hall, Burke and Hackett added.

College rapes continue, say crisis counselors

by College Press Service

Shocked when 16 victims of campus rapes came for help within a six-week period, the Rape Treatment Center of Santa Monica [Calif.] Hospital last week publicly asked college presidents to step up efforts to prevent sexual assaults on students.

The center decided to issue its report, called "Sexual Assault on Campus: What Colleges Can Do," after treating the 16 women, an "inordinate number proportionate to our clientele," recalled Marybeth Roden of the center.

"Universities have a responsibility to protect students," she said.

"I think if rape is inevitable, relax and enjoy it."

—Indiana University basketball coach Bobby Knight

While sexual assaults on the nation's campuses seem to be happening more frequently, colleges themselves do not know how to prevent them or treat them when they happen, the report claimed.

As an example, the report cited a case in which a rape victim at one college lived down the hall from her assailant for several weeks after the attack while campus officials ground through their disciplinary procedures.

Such insensitivity amounts to "'revictimizing' the victim," the report said.

To stop it, the Santa Monica report urges colleges to adopt official policies that condemn sexual assaults, establish procedures to change living quarters when the victim and the alleged assailant live in the same dorm, implement educational programs about sexual assault, improve security measures and start better programs to treat victims.

Such programs would not be popular, if the persistence of Indiana's vandals is representative of general campus thought.

Indiana University [IU] students rebuilt a "shanty" aimed at shaming administrators into funding a rape crisis center.

"Campus is not a safe place and a crisis center is a valuable system that other universities provide," explained junior Laurie Nicholson.

Keeping the shanty up, moreover, has become a political issue in itself at Indiana. It has been torn down six times and vandalized 16 times since it was first built May 7. The structure was almost destroyed in August when somebody threw a homemade fire bomb in it.

Some believe the shanty has been vandalized to support Indiana basketball coach Bobby Knight. Knight outraged many, but apparently not all, Indiana students when he told an interviewer, "I think if rape is inevitable, relax and enjoy it."

But the shanty, said Indiana alumnus Mike Evans, was built to increase awareness of campus sexual assults that happened long before Knight's statement.

In a 1987 survey of 6,000 students at 32 colleges, one in six female students reported being raped during the previous year. The majority of those assaults were "acquaintance rapes."

In the same study, conducted by University of Arizona researchers, one of every 15 men said he had committed rape or had attempted rape during the same time period.

English dept. writing lab opens for second year

Press Release

Thomas Martinez, English professor and coordinator of the English department's writing laboratory [lab], announced that the lab began its second year of service to the University on Monday.

It operates from Room 106 in Corr Hall in the University Counseling Center and is staffed by three of the English department's graduate assistants, Elizabeth Biebel, Susan Page and Robert Waller.

Martinez indicated that last year the lab operated on an experimental basis, primarily to aid students in freshman English classes who needed extra assistance with their papers. Most of the students who attended the lab had been urged by their professors to seek help with a variety of difficulties that constantly appeared in their writing.

Last year's lab staff, which also consisted of three graduate assistants, checked the students' papers in order to tailor revision strategies, as well as corrections, to the suggestons made by the students' professors.

Some students from other than freshman English sections, once they found out that the lab existed, sought help there voluntarily.

This year the English department has opened the lab to all students from the University, although freshman students will receive first priority. Martinez said he hopes that more students will use the lab's facilities for personal help with their writing without being told to go.

Nevertheless, teachers from any department on campus may send students or strongly urge them to visit the lab for help. To aid the lab staff, teachers sending students to the lab should indicate the main writing problems they wish the tutors to examine.

The writing lab, therefore, supplements teacher-student conferences, provides further explanation of basic writing problems and considers more specifically teachers' comments on student papers.

The lab is not a proofreading or editing center. Students who come in to have someone check over a paper for punctuation, spelling, typographical and mechanical mistakes will not be served. However, students who want to check over their writing with a staff member may come to the lab.

The lab's staff will serve students who need assistance with any of the following writing problems:

1. Understanding an assignment — writer's block, purpose
2. Organization of subject — focus, unity of ideas
3. Insufficient development of thought — lack of detail, example
4. Paragraph unity, coherence — unclear thought references within paragraphs
5. Lack of clear transitions — from paragraph to paragraph and sentence to sentence
6. Weak sentence variety and flow — not enough variety of balanced, loose, periodic sentences
7. Awkwardly developed sentences — run-ons, fragments, weak parallelism, danglers
8. Inappropriate word choice — inexact words, wordiness
9. Agreement problems — subject-verb, pronoun, modifiers
10. Punctuation — comma splice, comma faults, semicolon

The writing lab is open during the week at the following hours: Monday 10 a.m.-2 p.m., Tuesday 10 a.m.-4 p.m., Wednesday 10 a.m.-4 p.m., Thursday 10 a.m.-3 p.m. and Friday 10 a.m.-1 p.m. For further information, contact Martinez in Vasey Hall, Room 201, or at 645-4645.

Casino Night progress stalls

By DIANE A. CILIONE
Staff Reporter

The proposed Casino Night plans, which were approved by the administration in April, have not progressed since that time.

Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities, said no further plans for Casino Night have been brought to her attention.

In April, the event was still in the planning stages, according to Sean Closkey, member of the Spring Festival committee. The targeted time for Casino Night last April was this semester or early next spring.

According to the Student Government committee proposal, Casino Night will be held in the Connelly Center. It will include games such as roulette, blackjack, poker and craps. There will be alcohol available for students over 21, he said.

Casino Night was proposed as an alternative to the Spring Festival, which was tenatively scheduled to take place last semester, but was later rejected by the administration.

Project Sunshine gains members

By LYNNAE BOROWSKI
Staff Reporter

The social action group Project Sunshine increased its membership this year by approximately 100 students.

"I can't believe it," said Project Sunshine Service Coordinator Therese Wenzel, about the increase to 370 active members. Thirty more students are waiting for available positions. A transportation shortage prevents the organization from using these volunteers.

Membership has increased by 100 for the social action group.

On Monday, Sunshine Community, one of the three volunteer committees in Project Sunshine, began visiting off-campus social agencies three and four times daily.

Among the activities sponsored at the agencies are tutoring underprivileged children at area Catholic schools, visiting the elderly at county nursing homes, working with a Hispanic youth group and helping the handicapped.

This group visits a different agency each week and returns frequently where additional help is needed, Wenzel said.

"Showing kids that someone older cares about them is the purpose of Saturday Sunshine," explains committee member Dave Durbano. Saturday Sunshine, another of the volunteer committees, spends two hours working with underprivileged children every weekend.

"One of the benefits of working on this committee is the closeness we develop with the kids," Durbano said.

The third committee of Project Sunshine is Sunshine Emergency Action. This team of volunteers is responsible for assisting at nursing homes, cleaning houses for the elderly and various other emergency projects throughout the year, explained Wenzel.

Project Sunshine will publish a newsletter twice and distribute posters on campus three times this year.

Furthermore, the organization is planning its annual event, Sunshine Day, for a Saturday in April. Children between the ages of 3 and 10 will come to campus to participate in the mini-carnival, according to Wenzel.

Wenzel said her primary goal for the organization this year is to maintain the reputation that the Villanova Project Sunshine has with agencies throughout the Philadelphia area of being generous and faithful to commitment.

Dobbin ceremony

Villanova's new president will be conducted by McCarthy, who is chairman of the Board of Trustees. Driscoll will present the new president to McCarthy, who will read the proclamation of investiture. An inaugural address by Dobbin will follow.

A presidential medallion has been commissioned for the inauguration and will be presented to Dobbin during the ceremonies. The medallion will become part of the accoutrements of the office of the president.

Dobbin, a 1958 graduate of Villanova, will become the University's 31st president. He was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., and raised on Staten Island. He was ordained to the priesthood in 1962 and began a teaching career at Malvern Preparatory School in Pennsylvania.

He has master's degrees in both theology and science from Catholic University and holds a doctorate in sacred theology from the University of Louvain in Belgium. He was a thelogy professor at the Washington Theological Union for 17 years before coming to Villanova in 1987 as associate vice president for Academic Affairs.

The Rev. Kail C. Ellis, O.S.A., dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, and College of Nursing Dean M. Louise Fitzpatrick, have served as co-chairpersons of the historical event.

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., will be inaugurated as University president on Oct. 5.

Villanova's first president was the Rev. John O'Dwyer, O.S.A., in 1843. The school opened in September of that year with seven students.

faculty secretary, Christine Lysionek, assistant to the dean of students. Lysionek will hold the position from year to year.

With new members entering the society every year, a faculty secretary offers the group some kind of stability and experience, Kohl said. Villanova's chapter of ODK meets once a month to discuss future plans, under the advice of Dr. Robert Stokes, director of Continuing Education.

Senators look at new term council chairman. Baker said, "I would like to see the council continue to work to enhance the status of the faculty. Certainly, it is a continuing process."

Baker said that the Senate is an effective way to get things changed "only in a limited way." He said that the Senate "is a very cumbersome mechanism for any rapid response for problems."

"We're at the threshold of greatness in more areas. We're already there in some areas. Fr. Dobbin is competent and capable to bring us through."

—Dr. Philip A. Monrone, chairman of the University Senate

He said, "We will continue as we have in the past to use every means at our disposal [to get things accomplished]. That will mean working through the Senate, the academic vice president and the president."

University budget

The University budget was another issue which the Senate examined last year. Maurone said, "The University has decided to make the budget driven by priorities. The budget becomes automatically created to meet those priorities and plans."

Maurone said that the budget is "very conservative." He added that the University "runs in the black and that's the way it should be."

He said that if the students do not want a tuition increase when the budget is presented this spring, the senators should be aware of this priority when the planning and priorities committee meets in November. This committee sets a list of budget priorities which the Senate votes on later this semester.

The intellectual climate, an issue presented in the Program Evaluation Committee report last spring, is a concern, Baker said.

"The intellectual climate is not what I would like it to be or what many individuals would like it to be," he said.

Maurone concluded, "We're at the threshold of greatness in more areas. We're already there in some areas. Fr. Dobbin is competent and capable to bring us through."

Meeting previewed

Hopkirk, professor of political science and Dr. John J. Schrems, chairman of the political science department, are the four faculty members who are running for the position.

In Monday's election, there was no majority vote. The run-off election most likely will be held on Oct. 13, said Maurone. This seat will be open for the meeting today.

Also, the rules and review committee is discussing requirement changes for senators who are transfer students, said Maurone. This issue concerns student Senators Christopher Sperduto and Jonathan Zahm. If the rules and review committee makes a decision concerning the issue this week, it could be brought up under new business at today's meeting, said Maurone.

The change is a constitutional one, so the issue must be decided by the senators. If the recommendation is made by the rules and review committee, the action would only require a majority vote to be implemented.

"Books are the legacies that a great genius leaves to mankind, which are delivered down from generation to generation, as presents to the posterity of those who are yet unborn," according to the Spectator magazine. This quote has inspired the title of a book display being exhibited until Sunday in the adjoining galleries of The Historical Society of Pennsylvania and The Library Company of Philadelphia at 1300 Locust St.

Titled "Legacies of Genius: A Celebration of Philadelphia Libraries," the collection features books, manuscripts and works of art documenting a wide array of subjects.

"Legacies of Genius" is much more than encased displays, and there are many opportunities for "hands-on-experience." Graphic dramatic designs reveal in detail the meanings which lie beneath the surface. A variety of workshops and guided tours are also offered for the public to truly experience the treasures housed in the libraries of Philadelphia.

National magazines challenge college papers

By College Press Service

Two new national competitors to campus newspapers have appeared in recent weeks, and could jeopardize the papers' financial health.

Student Life, published by Time, Inc., hit campuses on Sept. 11.

A new version of Campus Voice, produced by Whittle Communications of Knoxville, Tenn., howed on more than 300 campuses in August.

The publications threaten to attract national advertising dollars that ordinarily might go to the papers themselves.

While the publications typically publish rehashed or old news Campus Voice's Aug. 29 issue, for example, had a lead story about a year-old crackdown on fraternities at Gettysburg College in Pennsylvania; "U.," another of the publications, reruns month-old local stories from campus papers — they take vital national advertising dollars away from student papers.

Mars Candy, AT&T and Lever Brothers, among others, advertised in the Aug. 29 Campus Voice "newspaper on the wall," spending $555,000 each for an annual advertising contract that in years past might have gone to student publications instead.

University of Washington Daily advisor Barbara Krohn noted even CASS, an Evanston, Ill., ad broker that is supposed to route national ads to campus papers, is publishing a catalog that takes ads away from the student publications it purports to represent.

No one, in fact, knows how much money Campus Voice, Student Life, CASS, U., Ampersand and two just-folded predecessors, Newsweek On Campus and Business Week Careers, have drawn from the campus papers in recent years.

A group called College Newspapers Business and Advertising Managers [CNBAM], which tracks campus paper money issues, has no current national advertising data, reported Judy Klein, CNBAM's president.

But campus papers themselves say they are not getting as much lucrative national advertising as in the past.

"The amount of money coming to the college market [from national advertisers] has increased," said Eric Jacobs, general manager of the Daily Pennsylvanian at the University of Pennsylvania, "but we're not getting our share."

"The money is going to other media," he said.

Jacobs added The Pennsylvanian has not enjoyed an increase in national advertising "for 5-to-7 years. The national advertising trend is flat."

"Flat" would be an improvement at Kansas State University, [KSU] where national ad revenues have dropped from $36,000 in fall 1984 to only $11,000 in fall 1988. Beer ads, lost when Kansas's legal drinking age rose to 21, made a significant part of the difference, said Gloria Freeland, KSU's acting director of publications.

"We hope the trend won't continue," said Freeland.

The University of Florida Alligator is "getting its share" of national advertising — about $225,000 last year — General Manager Ed Barber said, though he attributes it to aggressive marketing to national ad agencies and representation by three major companies.

Utah Daily Chronicle General Manager Robert McComber said his national ad revenues were down, but blamed the national economy, which in fact has been expanding for five consecutive years, and his paper's prohibition against ads for cigarettes and alcoholic beverages.

"College newspapers are suffering from a softness in the market," said newspaper industry analyst John Morton of Washington, D.C.

The national publications themselves swear they do not want to harm the college press.

We are determined to augment the work of the college press. It would be against all our goals to do anything to weaken the college press," asserted Sheena Paterson-Berwick, U.'s publisher.

Campus Voice Senior Editor Sheila De La Rosa maintained that "CV [Campus Voice] complements what the campus publications do."

Both De La Rosa and Paterson-Berwick, however, noted that national advertisers find it much more efficient to appear in the bigger publications.

One reason is that campus papers may have "haphazard distribution" and they may be "freebies." Advertisers prefer paid readership, readers who are paying attention, suggests Pat Reilly, print media reporter for Advertising Age.

The national publications, moreover, can offer glossy stock and color reproduction that most campus papers offer only in "inserts" hand-collated into their papers. Most compelling, however, is cost.

A magazine-sized ad in each of the biggest 150 college papers would reach 3.8 million students and would cost $624,800 per insertion, explained Mark Rose of CASS, the ad broker for campus papers nationwide. That is $624,800 for 10 ads.

By contrast, Campus Voice brings an advertiser's message to 3.7 million students on 365 campuses during 34 weeks for $555,000, said John Glasscott of the magazine.

"The advertiser reaches half the students in America each day where they live, work and play," Glasscott said.

Good luck in Ads, Sharon

At Smith Corona, simplicity is the mother of invention.

Our engineers racked their brains so you won't have to.

We started out with a very simple idea.

To make electronic typewriters and word processors that have lots of great features but are very simple to use.

We make the simplest typewriters in memory.

So simple you don't have to keep one eye on your typing and one eye on the instruction manual.

So simple you don't need a degree in computer programming to operate them.

So simple they can even make a confirmed non-typist comfortable at the keyboard.

Call it human engineering if you like. Or call it ergonomics. Or call it plain old inspiration.

What we came up with is a line of remarkable typewriters that are sophisticated without being complicated.

In fact, they're unlike any other typewriters you've ever seen before... or used before...or muttered at before.

Take our new Smith Corona SD 700. (Lots of people are going to.)

We call the SD 700 the Memory Typewriter. You just may call it the simplest typewriter in memory.

It features a 7,000 character editable memory you can access with the mere flip of a switch.

Combined with the 16 character LCD display, you can proofread, correct and make changes before you ever put anything down on paper.

Of course, should you want to Give your typing a screen test.

make changes on paper, we've made that simpler than ever too.

On the SD 700, as well as on every new Smith Corona typewriter, you'll find our new correcting cassette.

It's easy-to-load and you can insert it in seconds.

There are no spools to unwind. No complicated threading. No tangles.

So now correcting mistakes is as easy as making them.

We've reformed the correction system.

Add features like a Spell-Right™ 50,000 word electronic dictionary, WordFind,® WordEraser,® Full Line Correction and much more and you've got a typewriter that's not just incredibly simple to use, but simply impossible to pass up.

Of course, the same goes for every other Smith Corona typewriter and word processor as well.

Which is why we recommend that you hurry to your nearest store and try our machines yourself.

Obviously, they won't come to you.

Yet.

Phil Brach: A true leader

When the words dedication and commitment are used, one cannot help think of an outstanding Villanova leader, Phil Brach, Student Government president. Brach will soon pass his reigns to John Lewis, whom we are confident will continue the tradition.

The Brach administration has accomplished much more than anticipated and will be remembered as a high point in Student Government history. Under his supervision, a report on coed dormitories and an improved student directory were issued. The left-turn signal on Ithan and Lancaster avenues was installed and a successful used book sale was held.

But more importantly, Brach has concentrated on the improvement of relationships during his years at Villanova. Even before his presidency, he was involved in the Town and Gown Committee, a group composed of Radnor Township residents and Villanova officials and students.

As president he has helped the relationship between the administration and students, as we saw faculty and administration members listen to the student concerns at the budget Senate meeting.

Brach has been instrumental to the outstanding progress Student Government has achieved. We applaud the effort, time and dedication he has unquestionably given all Villanova students during his term.

Support Amnesty

As Americans we sometimes take our rights and privileges for granted. We fail to appreciate our freedoms and quite often we forget that not everyone in this world has the same rights. The recent "Human Rights Now!" tour increased our awareness of the existence of prisoners of conscience, and we applaud the 75,000 Philadelphians who supported the cause and hope the interest does not die as the performers depart.

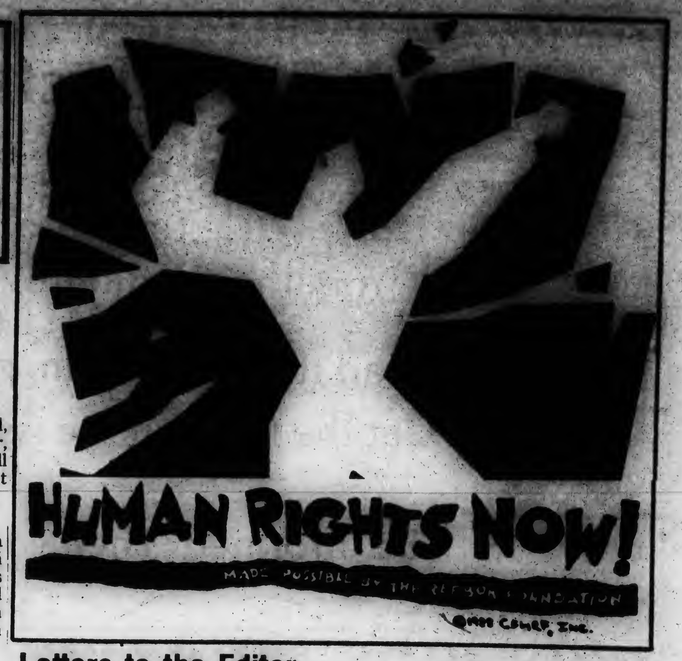
Amnesty International is an independent worldwide movement that works impartially for the release of prisoners of conscience. The group also works for prompt and fair trials as well as for the end of all executions and torture throughout the world.

Rock superstars such as Bruce Springsteen, Sting and Peter Gabriel participated in the recent concert at J.F.K. Stadium in Philadelphia.

The message throughout the concert was clear; the issue of human rights is serious; people can make a difference by their support.

At Villanova we can continue the fight for human rights. The Center for Peace and Justice is concerned with Amnesty International. Let's make this group a powerful voice on campus. Support the cause in our own backyard; show your interest by joining the center.

Thankfully we have our rights secured. Let's show the less fortunate that we truly care about theirs.



Letters to the Editor

No generation gap for substance, alcohol abuse

To the Editors:

We returned to Pennsylvania this year faced with a new set of drinking laws. These laws impose stricter penalties for underage drinking and, therefore, are aimed primarily at college students. However, we witnessed someting on Sept. 19 that raised a question as to who lawmakers should focus on when trying to eradicate drug and alcohol abuse.

The Amnesty International concert was held Sept. 19 in Philadelphia. We went to enjoy some great music for a good cause; for this reason we were not drunk, stoned or otherwise mind-altered.

However, many of those around us were, and a quick glance at them showed that they were not people our age but instead were about 10 years older than ourselves.

Behind us, cocaine was the main attraction for the first half hour of the concert. Next to us, our neighbors smoked four or five marajuana joints throughout the duration of the show, passing them to the people below us and drinking all the while.

One man sitting in back of us, at least eight years our senior, blacked out and collapsed, only to awaken a few minutes later with no recollection that anything had happened to him.

These people left not even halfway through the concert, presumably to drive home and endanger both their own lives and those of the other drivers on the road. Obviously, responsibility does not automatically come along with the magical age of 21, much less any age above that.

In contrast, the students (at least in our section) in the crowd were straight, sober, and concentrated on the next performer rather than on how intoxicated they could become.

Ironically, the guards seemed more interested in catching the students who were rushing the field to get closer to the stage, than concentrating on the more serious illegal occurrences.

We are not absolving the college population of all blame. Obviously, the increasing number of drinking deaths at colleges are an object of great concern and something must be done to deter this in the future. Neither are we claiming to be angels ourselves, or condemning others for what they choose to do.

Rather, we are suggesting that perhaps, in trying to diminish the drinking and drug abuse that is so prevalent today, lawmakers should begin with their own generation rather than immediately blaming ours, and thereby serve as role models for the students of today.

Op-ed

Don't knock Villanova Student Government

By DANTE J. SCALA

My faith in journalism's power to inform shuddered last week when I read the responses to the "On Campus" question about the effectiveness of Student Government.

Generally, I do not think too seriously about "On Campus." I do not believe that the average student's opinions are accurately represented by the feeble attempts at witty one-liners which most students offer. For the most part, last week's responses were not exceptions to the rule.

But nevertheless, they struck a nerve. Joe Allman began his term as Student Government president when I was a freshman reporter. Since then I have observed, cynically but hopefully, Allman's reformation process develop over the past two years. The Villanovan has recorded that process, has written about the good, the bad and the ugly.

Thus, when senior Charles P. Callahan dismissed Student Government last week with the remark, "If total ineptness is an accomplishment, I suppose that is something," it made me wonder. And when I realized most of the other responses were similar in tone, it made me worry.

Students are apathetic, I think, because they lack "empowerment," to use Allman's word. They are so used to having most of their lives supervised by "grown-ups" like "the Administration" that they do not believe they have the power to change things. Thus, they are reduced to grumbling and muttering, "You can't beat the system" — after all, it is much easier to complain than to act.

Last week's "On Campus" remarks display that apathetic frustration. And discouragingly, the students' frustration has distorted the facts about Student Government.

Thus, as a believer in Truth, Justice and Student Rights, I felt compelled to look through the Villanovan's files to see what Student Government has accomplished over the past two years. The following is a brief summary:

October 1986. The first of many Student Government meetings with neighborhood residents takes place. Over the past two years, Student Government has tried to keep the lines of communication open with the surrounding townships.

For instance, Student Government members have gone to township meetings and have created a committee composed of University and Radnor Township representatives which meets and discusses relevant issues.

In all, Student Government should be commended for presenting a positive image for Villanova students, who are not exactly on the top of our neighbors' Christmas card lists.

October 31, 1986. Student Government saves Fall Break. Through vigorous lobbying and research, students played a major part in persuading the University Senate to vote to keep the week-long vacation.

January 19, 1987. The student directory is distributed. A year earlier, Student Government President Greg Noone could not distribute a directory until April. (What good is a directory in April, you may ask? Exactly.)

February 20, 1987. The Senate passes a bill to create one mandatory reading day. Who proposed the bill? Student Government.

March 1987. A permit for a left-turn signal at the dangerous Lancaster-Ithan intersection is approved by the Pennsylvania Department of Transportation. Student Government aided in lobbying for this, too.

April 1987. Student Government succeeds in attaching an amendment to the Senate's University budget proposal which would send $200,000 in surplus funds to the financial aid budget. The Board of Trustees did not approve it.

October 1987. The Villanovan publishes a Student Government survey, which indicates overwhelming student interest in coed dormitories.

Student Government later presented a report on coed dormitories to the Senate and succeeded in pushing a bill through the Senate calling for a University study of coed dormitories. Last week, the new University president called for the report to be completed by December.

December 1987. The student directory is distributed.

February 1988. Student Government focuses attention on student cheating by aiding in creating a committee to write an honor code. Later, an official University committee began studying the issue of academic integrity.

March 1988. Student Government runs a voter registration drive. Approximately 500 students register in Radnor Township.

March 1988. Student Government organizes a protest against a University budget proposal which includes a 10 percent increase in tuition.

The result: 200 students fill the Senate's meeting hall, the largest demonstration in recent history. Students lost that vote, 17—16. But they showed they would not numbly accept whatever the administration decided was best for the University.

In all, my response to the "On Campus" group is just the facts, ma'am, just the facts. Yes, Sean Delaney, there is a Student Government. Jodi and Terri, if you "don't know anything about what they have accomplished," I suggest reading the Villanovan, if it is not too much of a strain.

But then, ignorance is bliss, right?

UCO targets insecure students

By FRANK PUCCI

"Be careful what you join in college!" — this is a warning I frequently heard soon after graduating from high school.

New students must pay particular attention to this warning because the influences you get from college groups at such a delicate time in your lives can alter your thinking or even influence decisions that will affect you the rest of your life.

Of course, college-based organizations are generally set up to serve whatever interests are shared by students, faculty or the local community. However, take particular note of ones concerning rather personal issues, like politics or religion. Be suspicious of college groups focusing on these touchy issues and how they seek new members and try to gain a following.

I must warn you that there is at least one such manipulating troop here at Villanova — it is Christian Outreach (UCO). Some of you have already talked with UCO members or have been invited to UCO gatherings. Little did you know that UCO members' initial attempts to get acquainted with new people like you is the first step in their attempt to trick you into absorbing their brand of obstinate fundamentalism.

Knowing UCO's technique from experience, I can "map out" the rest of it for you step-by-step:

Step 2. When you go to UCO parties you will meet long standing UCO members, many of whom are graduates.

Step 3. At UCO parties, or even just around campus, UCO members invite newly familiar faces to their Wednesday night prayer meetings (or to future social gatherings, just to keep you "interested"). A few students decide to go, even if they are not particularly devout Catholics. One might go "just to see what it's like," to see your new "friends" again

Step 4. What goes on at the meetings? At the few I went to there were praying, singing and group discussions, but nothing truly bizarre. However, former attenders, who now refuse to have anything to do with UCO, said that some meetings they went to included more intense elements (walking in a trance, "speaking in tongues," etc.).

Step 5. A member (who still pretends to truly be your friend) may ask to talk to you in your dorm room. It may last for hours late at night — wasting plenty of study time — but you, of course, do not have the heart to throw him out. Conversation starts out casual, but it eventually leads to a religious debate. The UCO member deceptively convinces you that what he says is the "truth about God." I myself had a few talks with a key UCO member; I now know he was only putting on an act to manipulate my emotions and alter my religious beliefs to match his.

UCO may ask you to read one of their pamphlets or watch a movie on videotape; these media are usually propaganda in disguise. A Villanova professor described a UCO pamphlet he read a few years ago as a "manipulative masterpiece" having poor intellectual content and a teaching method close to brainwashing.

What UCO is doing to young peoples' thinking patterns is 100 percent wrong. I find it very insulting that UCO not only denies that its teaching methods are brainwashed trickery, but that it uses Jesus Christ as a shield in doing so.

Parking situation must improve

To The Editor:

As a student entering my fourth year at Villanova, I am disgusted and dismayed to find that the parking situation has, if anything, become worse over the years. If students consistently must park illegally, shouldn't that convey a message?

Do those in the Security Department think that students want to park illegally, and want to put their cars in jeopardy of being ticketed, towed or smashed? No, we do not — there is simply no more room!

It has also come to my attention that cars in the way of potentially towed cars are moved without permission or discretion. This is outrageous!

On more than one occasion students have come out to the lot after classes to find a trashed bumper due to the carelessness of some tow truck operator. What it comes right down to is that this school is always the first to blame the student or push some administrative or financial problem onto the students.

I realize that Security does not deserve another knock. However, when I am told to "go park on South Campus," my first reaction is to be completely offended at the guard telling me to do so.

As a freshman I quietly paid Villanova parking tickets, but those days are long past. I am fed up and I have had enough. I refuse to take responsibility for a problem this school has blatantly ignored for years.

Those Security officers watch cars circle the lot eight or nine times. Couldn't they help open up this problem for the review of the administration?

If this blind ticketing continues, the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president should prepare himself to receive, not only a huge problem, but a pile of unpaid tickets.

Support senators

To the Editor:

Today marks the first meeting of the 1988-89 University Senate. The Senate is the policy-making body of the University, comprised of students, faculty, administration and alumni. In the course of this academic year, the Senate will convene six times to discuss a wide range of issues. As a member of the Senate, I encourage you to attend the meetings and witness the policy-making process at work.

I also invite students to stop by 204 Dougherty Hall and voice your opinions to your senators, Student Government president or members of the Executive Cabinet. We are here to work with you and are most effective when we are aware of your concerns. I hope to see many of you today at 4 p.m. in the West Lounge.

Defend Noone

To The Editor:

In the spring of 1986, the rules of Student Government elections at Villanova University were drastically changed. In his quest for re-election to the office of Student Government president, my classmate and friend Greg Noone was challenged by Joseph Allman.

However, what should have been a peaceful election for a president degenerated into a barrage of mud slinging of which Wilson Goode and Frank Rizzo would have been proud.

Candidate Allman and his henchmen, campaign managers Joel Shmuckler and Mike McGinnis launched several unsolicited personal attacks on the incumbent in order to gain the upper hand.

It seems to me as if the precedent set by Allman has never ended. In reading the Sept. 16 edition of the Villanovan, I could not help but think that Allman's mudslinging had worked in more ways than one.

The memory of Noone's administration is continually stirred up for use as a scapegoat for everything that was bad about Student Government before the arrival of savior Allman. It is a scary parallel to the way Trotsky was used by the Stalin regime in the Soviet Union.

The record must be set straight. Greg Noone was not only a fine, dedicated and committed Student Government president, but his presence at Villanova University made the school a better place from the moment he first arrived at freshman orientation.

If he had a fault, it was that he was too involved at Villanova — a Special Olympics volunteer, Rugby "A" team wing forward, House Council officer and a Student Government officer for two terms.

He gave everything he could to each activity in addition to finding time for his studies.

He was not a "weak and ineffective president," as Kathy Connolly said. Jennifer Reidy could not be more wrong in referring to his presidency as "the dark age."

In fact, several programs that Allman completed were actually begun by the Noone administration, for example the installation of a left turn signal at the corner of Ithan and Lancaster Avenues.

Greg Noone graduated from Villanova in 1987, and is now in his second year at law school. He continues to be a fine human being, perhaps strengthened by the personal attacks he suffered at the hands of Joe Allman.

However he is no longer at Villanova to defend himself, and it is unfair and un-Christian for people like Connolly and Reidy to continue to drag his good name through the mud. To continue to beat up on him in the press in unfair and underhanded. Connolly and Reidy should be ashamed of themselves. They owe Noone a public apology.

Pi Kapp apology

To the Editor:

On behalf of the Brotherhood of Pi Kappa Phi, we would like to apologize for distributing a Rush poster that was deemed to be sexist in nature. In an attempt to atone for this indiscretion, our Brothers actively sought out and pulled down the offending item. We meant no harm and in no way sought to demean women.

The national fraternity of which we are members is highly concerned with the problems of sex abuse and date rape on today's campus; Pi Kappa Phi has won national awards for it's "Today's Greeks Call It Date Rape" campaign.

To explain our motivation concerning the design of the poster, we can only say that we had hoped to gain attention with a placard that differed from the traditional.

We again apologize for the insensitivity of the final product, and we will endeavor to increase our awareness of the attitudes and concerns of the Villanova community so that we may better serve and interact with all its members.

Event a success

To the Editor:

We write this letter with admiration for the people who worked hard to make Club Coca-Cola a tremendous success. It was a pleasure to see the Villanova community come together in a nightclub atmosphere to support such a worthwhile event.

Over 1,100 people purchased tickets with the proceeds directed toward Special Olympics.

The collaborated efforts of the Villanova Student Union, orientation staff, Greek community and Special Olympics resulted in a great evening. However, the preparation began months before the event.

Jeanne Maguire, assistant program director for the Union, and Chris Ippolito, concerts committee coordinator, introduced the idea and directed the efforts of several key members.

Thanks

To the Editor:

On Sept. 17, the Villanova Student Union coordinated a campus social event that drew over 1,200 students — clearly one of the most successful events in recent years. The event of which I speak is Club Coca-Cola, a fundraising dance club that benefits Special Olympics.

The Special Olympics program has been a part of life at Villanova for 10 years now, and the Union must be commended for choosing to keep that tradition alive and growing.

The money raised will be sent to Special Olympics International, who will filter a percentage of the proceeds back to our own program hosted by Villanova at the state level.

On behalf of Villanova's Special Olympics Games Committee, I would like to extend my personal thanks to Chris Ippolito, Anna Maria Kelly, Jeanne Maguire, the Union Executive Board and the many volunteers that made Saturday's event such a great success!

'Nova students to shop hi-tech at Computer Fair

By MARIA LOVETT
Staff Reporter

If you are interested in making your academic studies as simple as possible, a personal computer could be the answer for you. Visit the sixth annual Computer Fair, sponsored by UCIS (University Computing And Information Services) on Sept. 28 in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center. The fair will run from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. All students, faculty and staff are welcome.

The Computer Fair is geared toward Villanova students in particular. UCIS wants to give all students a chance to see and experience computers. As Villanova becomes more and more computer-oriented, students may wish to purchase computers of their own.

According to Dan McGee, manager of academic services for UCIS, personal computers can be a great advantage to all Villanova students, both in college and later in life.

"Computers are used in every facet of life. For students, the computer can make the job much easier," said McGee.

UCIS will distribute a computer buyers guide full of information about the different computer products and discounts available.

More vendors will be participating in this year's fair than any previous fair. Representatives from several computer companies will demonstrate their products. Among those attending will be IBM and Zenith, the two computer companies represented in Villanova's facilities, as well as Apple and Radio Shack.

The vendors will display a wide variety of computers, printers and software. "Computer Renaissance," a local computer store that buys and sells used computers, will also be attending.

"Computers are being used increasingly in every college here at Villanova."

Discounts of up to 40 percent will be offered by all the vendors. The discounts will be good for 30 days after the computer fair. The UCIS will have an information booth set up at the fair to answer any questions and give unbiased opinions concerning the computer suitable for a student's particular needs.

The UCIS booth will also be available to discuss which computers are used at Villanova, how to order equipment and how to translate the computer lingo you may hear at the fair.

Attending the computer fair will be a very worthwhile experience for all Villanova students. "Computers are being used increasingly in every college here at Villanova," commented McGee.

Presently, 100 public computers are available around campus; however, this is not enough to accommodate the growing demand. So take advantage of the Computer Fair to learn how computers can help you.

Villanova students will be testing the newest and best at next week's Computer Fair.

Villanova Union programs fun

By KAREN IOVINO
Staff Reporter

Did you ever wonder who chooses the great movies shown in the Connelly Center Cinema each week? Or who organizes the spring break trips? Curious about how the various lecturers featured at Villanova are chosen? Each of these varied events, along with many more, generate from the same source — the Villanova Student Union.

According to President John Price, the Union is the "major programming organization on campus. We serve two main functions; choosing and programming events, and organizing them, getting involved with the people. That's the social aspect of the Union."

In the 1987-88 school year, the Union sponsored a wide assortment of events on campus. Featured lecturers included Bella Abzug, former New York congresswoman; George Plimpton, sportswriter and Dick Gregory, comedian and weight-loss coach.

The Union also plans the Senior Dinner Dance, and tries to plan at least two of the count down to graduation "Days" parties held each year for seniors.

Scholastic pursuits are also encouraged by the Union, as they run the yearly College Bowl Competition.

This year, the Student Union tried something new by organizing the Club Coca-Cola nightclub held Sept. 17. According to Price, the Union was "very excited because 1,200 people came and we even had to turn 120 away because of space limitations. We couldn't have asked for better, and the Club might possibly be back."

Price outlined the Union's goals for the year as getting major musical groups to appear in concert at Villanova, and drawing from the success of Club Coca-Cola by continuing the idea of an on-campus nightclub. This will hopefully be the Cat's Den, a regularly occurring campus event planned by the Union. The Cat's Den would feature bands and a dance club atmosphere.

Although a successful recruitment meeting has alredy been held, Price stresses that new members are welcome anytime. Price echoed, "Anyone can get involved; it's up to them how much commitment they are willing to give." The Student Union office is located upstairs in the Connelly Center.

Committee aids homeless people

By JENNIFER TURAN
Staff Reporter

There are between two and three million people in the United States who are homeless. In 1983, a group of Villanova students formed the Villanova Committee for the Homeless of Philadelphia.

According to the committee's founding document, the main objective of the committee is to "bring the Villanova community to a deeper awareness of their Christian responsibility to minister to the poor and live the Gospel message."

Noreen Cameron is the Campus Ministry coordinator for the committee. She coordinates the student-run steering committee. Sept. 14 was the recruitment meeting, and between 150 and 200 students showed interest. Of that group, only a few were returning from last year.

The committee has four main goals. Cameron stated, "The first goal is to give students the opportunity to serve the needy."

Besides providing direct aid to the homeless, the committee also gives students the opportunity to serve the needy. The long-range goal of the program is that Villanova graduates who were involved in the Homeless Committee will continue their interest in helping the homeless, and will be further involved in the political issues that contribute to the problem of the homeless.

The largest annual event that the Homeless Committee coordinates is Homeless Awareness Day. The purpose of the day is to make Villanova students aware of the homeless situation. The event takes place on the Feast of St. Thomas of Villanova, because St. Thomas is known as the "Father of the Poor," and was the founder of the first soup kitchen.

Education fact sheets will be passed out to students. The sheets are intended to give students concrete facts about the homeless. Students will also have the opportunity to view a film about the homeless in the cinema or a video in the Belle Aire Terrace.

Additionally, hot dogs and hamburgers will be sold in front of Connelly Center, and the money collected will go directly to the poor. A raffle will also take place, and the donated prizes will be given to the poor.

The biggest part of Homeless Awareness Day is the canned goods sale. Canned goods are purchased by the committee at cost and are sold to Villanova students. The students then donate them to the poor and the cans and money are taken to the various shelters. No money made is kept by the Committee — every cent goes to aid the homeless.

There are four main divisions of the Villanova Committee for the Homeless. The oldest is the street committee. This committee is run by seniors Paul Dorsey and David Budd. Every Monday and Wednesday evening, six Villanova students go to Philadelphia and spent three hours giving food to the poor.

In the past, peanut butter sandwiches were given out, but this year bologna and cheese sandwiches, fruit and candy will be distributed. Dr. John Cawley, a Villanova chemistry professor, and his wife Barbara donate six loaves of bread per week for this purpose. The candy is donated by the Connelly Center.

The sandwich packages are put together the night before by various groups of friends, and by sororities as a social awareness project. They are then taken to St. Clare House, and from there they are distributed around town.

This year the Committee will be working with the Philadelphia Committee for the Homeless. Through their contact with this organization, they will be able to learn more about the homeless situation and about other ways they can help. The street committee wants not only to feed the homeless, but to get to know them. By knowing their histories, perhaps they will be able to do more for them than just satisfy their hunger.

The soup kitchen committee goes to the St. Francis Inn on Thursday evenings and Saturday mornings, and spends about four hours serving meals to men, women and children. The committee is headed by senior Nora Corcoran, junior Amy Landnyt and sophomore Angela Anastasio.

The environmental committee, headed by Bill Sicord and Mary Beth Donahue, demands a larger time commitment. On weekends, this committee does repair work and contributes to the beautification of shelters. They do shelving, painting and repairing windows and lighting.

This committee is also involved with Habitat for Humanity, which

Elle Dopa wins rat race

College Press Service

The gymnast stepped out on to the high bar, quivering as she tried to steady herself. She lost her balance and fell from the bar, but won the crowd's hearts when she twirled her tail around the bar, saving herself from a 14-inch fall.

Mary Lou Retton never faced competition like this, but then she never won a chocolate chip either.

The competiton was indeed fast and furious at the second annual Rat Olympics, held last month at Kalamazoo College.

Since June, about 50 psychology students have trained 11 white, pink-eyed rats to inch their way across the two-foot-long, quarter-inch-wide high bar, jump hurdles and climb a five-foot vertical screen.

Tempted by a piece of a chocolate chip cookie, the rats in the Tri-Rathlon also had to climb a five-step ladder and make their way through a tunnel and a pan filled with an inch of water.

Professor Lyn Raible said it all started as a way to teach her students about learning and conditioning, but turned into a sensitivity seminar as well.

"In some of my classes we do live animal experiments with the rats, and I found this teaches sensitivity," she said. "They realize that rats have personalities and feelings, and it makes them think twice before they do their experiment."

"I was really afraid of them when we started, but they're really sweet," said junior Robin Lake as Mimi, her rat, crawled across her shoulders.

The competitors were all females . . . because male rats are too ugly, fat and lazy.

"We've been together about 10 weeks and we've gotten very close," Tom Remble said of his rat, who sported a Superman cape and red, white and blue tail during the rodent games. "Most people think of rats as mean, but she's very peaceful and affectionate."

The competitors were all females, Raible said, because male rats are too ugly, fat and lazy.

Although no overall winner was announced, the concensus among the crowd of about 75 was that the champion was Elle Dopa, named after L-Dopa, a drug substitute for dopamine, a brain chemical.

Elle Dopa and the rest of the cheesey crew may be on their way to even greater fame, Raible said. She has tried to get the rodents on Late Night with David Letterman's Stupid Pet Tricks segment. So far, the show has rejected the rats, claiming they are not pets.

"Can you imagine?" Raible asked.

Homeless Committee

is an international organization that buys abandoned houses, repairs them and sells them to impoverished families for a small downpayment with no interest. Students helping with this aspect of the environmental committee spend eight hours per weekend in Philadelphia.

According to Noreen Cameron, the purpose of the education committee is "to organize events and information, to raise the consciousness of the Villanova campus and to give people information about the homeless." This committee was started by Villanova alumnus Ann Ryan, and is now being directed by Sharon Waters and Julie Gargula.

The sandwich-making committee is headed by Christine Calvisto. They put out a newsletter called Home Base twice a semester, and plan a Halloween party for the children of St. Francis Center. They are responsible for finding out what the various shelters need, and assigning money, people and events where needed. They also coordinate Homeless Awareness Day, and sell lollipops that have facts about the homelss on them.

September is a crucial time of the year for helping the homeless because it is a time when donations are low. So make an effort and give the Committee for the Homeless your support — it would make a difference!

The Boss returns

By JOHN F. SWIFT
Assistant Sports Editor

The Boss is back! Well, sort of back. Bruce Springsteen's Chimes of Freedom is a mini-LP composed of only four songs that were recorded live on his Tunnel of Love Tour.

The release of this album coincided with the opening of the heralded Amnesty International Tour of which Springsteen, along with performers such as Peter Gabriel and Sting, are members.

The focus of the tour is human rights for everyone and an increased awareness of them by people around the world. With knowledge of this, it is not difficult for one to see why Springsteen chose the four songs that he did for this album.

Bruce is no stranger to causes such as this. He participated in the "USA for Africa" effort as well as on the Very Special Christmas album that was released last Christmas. In addition to these, Bruce has also contributed a great deal of time and money to various social causes, some which received much publicity, some which did not.

"Toucher than the Rest" is a cut off Bruce's most recent album, Tunnell of Love. Its slow tempo characterizes the somber mood of the song. It seems to promote a feeling of sympathy for the man whose love is not reciprocated. The next tune, "Be True," is one which asks for loyalty toward a cause or a person. The upbeat melody and catchy tempo make it quite enjoyable.

If you have not captured the gist of the Boss message by this point, the next song, "Chimes of Freedom," will make it glaringly evident. Springsteen makes an appeal directed at the heart of the Amnesty cause: peaceful resolu-

Love in the Time of Cholers
Gabriel Garcia Marquez
Alfred A. Knopf Publishers

Love in all its forms is the subject of Love in the Time of Cholera, the latest novel by Gabriel Garcia Marquez, winner of the 1982 Nobel Prize for Literature.

The academy cited Marquez's "richly compsed world of imagination" when presenting the Columbian-born author with the prize. Marquez has been composing his "world of imagination" in short stories and novels since 1968, after a successful newspaper career as a foreign correspondent. This is the tenth of his books to be translated into English, the most notable being his international best-seller, One Hundred Years of Solitude, in 1970.

This fragile balance between doubt and assurance of love throughout marriage, but prominant in old age, is lovingly conveyed by Marquez.

Love in the Time of Cholera is set in an unnamed Carribean province ravaged by epidemics and civil wars in the second half of the 19th century. The story is concerned with a love triangle and how this triangle interacts for over 50 years, from their impetuous youths to their more sober twilights.

The female in the triangle is Fermina Daza, a strong-willed girl questing freedom, but feeling the pressure of a low-born father to marry into society and gain respectability for the family. Her father's plan is interrupted when she becomes involved with Florentino Ariza, an eccentric young romantic.

Ariza romances Daza with passionate letters and violin serenades. Trapped in this consuming, "devastating" love, Ariza even becomes ill with symptoms mimicking cholera.

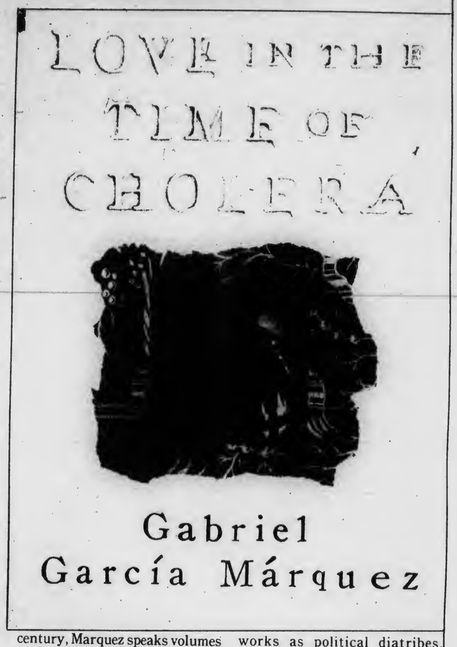
When Daza sees through the illusory foundation of their love and breaks up with him, Ariza is shattered and vows to continue his love for her, a love which will go unrequited for "53 years, seven months and 11 days and nights."

Dr. Juvenal Urbino then enters the picture. He falls for the beautiful Daza but, despite his high social standing and good looks, she continues to treasure her independence. Slowly, he wins her over in a very gentlemanly courtship.

Marquez then goes through the various stages of their marriage. He wonderfully captures the awkwardness and playfulness of newlyweds with his keen understanding of human nature. As good as his depictions of young married life and the more stable, middle-aged married life are, neither however, can compare to his tender portrait of marriage in old age.

Of the final years of the marriage he writes, "Neither could have said if their mutual dependence was based on love or convenience, but they had never asked the question with their hands on their hearts because both had always preferred not to know the answer." This fragile balance between doubt and assurance of love throughout marriage, but so prominent in old age, is lovingly conveyed by Marquez.

Marquez takes the rather pedestrian vehicle of a love triangle and makes it shine by concentrating on the humanity of the character and the basic human nature behind their situations. Although he is writing specifically of love in the Caribbean in the 19th century, Marquez speaks volumes bout love in all its forms throughout time. His imaginative power brings the story to life, but it is the human essence he pays so much attention to that gives it soul.



A major criticism of Marquez has been of his leftist sympathies and their influence on his works. His long friendships with French President Francois Mitterrand and Cuban President Fidel Castro have caused many to view his works as political diatribes. Although he mentions a civil war in this book and briefly writes of the leftist side, no blatant politics are perceivable.

Love in the Time of Cholera is a great book to read for the imaginative 19th century world it recounts and the true-to-lifeness of its characters, but most of all for the amazing ability possessed by Marquez to get at the heart of the complex human emotion of love.

Springsteen performs for human rights prompt and fair trials and to end all executions and torture.

The seriousness of the cause made the concert a bit different in tone from ordinary stadium — shaking rock shows. As fans entered the stadium, they were given "passports" — copies of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. This declaration was adopted by the United Nations in 1948, but has been virtually ignored by governments throughout the world. There were also tables set up all around the stadium with petitions to various dictators.

The concert programs were not just glossy bios of the stars but instead told why each performer was a member of Amnesty International. Even the concert t-shirts had a message: "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights," they said in seven different languages. The performers kept with the theme as well. Not only did they do some of their biggest hits, but some of their "message" music as well.

Springsteen, Sting, Gabriel, Chapman, N'Dour and Baez lined up on the stage at exactly 5 p.m. to open the show with Bob Marley's "Get Up, Stand Up." Then, Baez, a veteran performer of benefit rock concerts, took the crowd back to the roots of the idealistic '60s with a cappella versions of "Imagine" and "Let It Be."

Youssou N'Dour

Youssou N'Dour, an African singer, was the first major act. N'Dour is best known for his back-up vocals on Gabriel's SO album, especially "In Your Eyes." Although most of the crowd was unfamiliar with N'Dour's music, they were quite receptive to his set, which featured a soulful beat and an African dancer. His performance added a depth to the program and was effective live.

The seriousness of the cause made the concert a bit different in tone from ordinary stadium-shaking rock shows.

Tracy Chapman

Tracy Chapman, the folk-singer who is fast becoming famous, was next. She was dressed in black (definitely the stage color of choice for all the performers) and was backed only by her acoustic guitar. The emphasis of Chapman's set was on her earthy alto voice and her music. The sound during her set was surprisingly clear, considering J.F.K.'s vast size.

Chapman did most of the cuts from Behind the Wall, her debut LP, starting with "Across The Lines." Standout songs included the a cappella tale of domestic violence, "Behind the Wall" and "Fast Car," Chapman's first single. This song got the biggest crowd response.

She was a simple and straightforward performer — much like her music. She did not dance or move much and seemed almost shy. Chapman's music was her communicator; not everyone knew her songs, but everyone listened.

Sting

Sting, the singer/songwriter who is a blend of good-looking arrogance and detached compassion, was the third major act. He opened with the Police standard, "King Of Pain." He then introduced "Set Them Free" by saying, "This is for [jailed South African leader] Nelson Mandela."

Sting did a mixture of old Police tunes ("One World" and "When The World Is Running Down ...") as well as some songs in his new pop-jazz style (the melodic guitar work of "Fragile" and "Bring On The Night").

A highlight was his duet with Peter Gabriel on "They Dance Alone (Gueca Solo)."

The Gueca Solo is a dance done by women in Chile. They are mourning the disappearance of their husbands, sons and fathers who have been arrested and never heard from.

Sting's encore was "Every Breath You Take," with Springsteen adding backing vocals. This was the first of the many "guest" appearances the headliners did in each others sets.

Peter Gabriel

As the hazy sky turned to dusk, Gabriel, music's premier art-rock performer, took the stage; he was in rare form. He opened with the instrumental "Of These, Hope" from "The Last Temptation of Christ" soundtrack.

Gabriel goosestepped around the stage to "Games Without Frontiers" after dedicating it to "... the 45,000 unnecessary prisoners in Nicaragua." Midway through his set, Chapman joined him to do the Kate Bush vocals on "Don't Give Up." The combination was wonderfully compelling.

Just as the crowd was thinking, "Hey, he hasn't done any of his really big hits from SO," Gabriel slammed into "Sledgehammer" and an extended version of "In Your Eyes" with N'Dour.

His encore was the classic and timely "Biko," which is about murdered South African activist, Stephen Biko. The crowd raised their hands and sang along with Gabriel for almost seven minutes.

Bruce Springsteen

The moment much of the crowd had been waiting for came at 11 p.m. — Bruce Springsteen and the E Street band jammed into "Born In The U.S.A." Springsteen is known for his four-hour concerts, so the fact that he kept his set to only over an hour was remarkable. He managed to squeeze most of his classic songs into his set.

Springsteen is known for his four-hour concerts, so the fact that he kept his set to only over an hour was remarkable.

Not only did he perform, "Cover Me," "Cadillac Ranch," "Thunder Road," "Born To Run" and "My Hometown," he also did "Jungleland" — a song that he has rarely performed in the past few years.

Also effective was his pounding "War" and a deeper, more soul-searching version of "The River" that he did as a duet with Sting.

Springsteen ended his set with "Raise Your Hand" and somersaulted off stage. He was quickly back to join the other headliners for "Chimes of Freedom" and a reprise of "Get Up, Stand Up."

Dynagroove looks towards a bright future

By DIANE DRAGONETTE
Staff Reporter

"Now it's time to move your feet/let it move to the Dynagroove beat," sings Smokin' Erik in a tune entitled "Dynagroove School." Dynagroove is a hot Philadelphia band, and "Dynagroove School" is definitely something in which Villanova students should enroll for a good time. Lead singer Smokin' Erik Horvitz spoke about the band's music in a recent interview, so lesson No. 1 will begin right here.

Dynagroove has been together for almost three years, and this five-piece unit consists of Smokin' Erik (lead vocals, guitar), Bryan "Woody" Ward (bass), Scott "Bill" Derr (drums), Darryl Ray "Dr. Jam" Jenkins (sax), and Drew Carr (guitar, vocals). Smokin' Erik commented on how the band became established in the Philadelphia area. "We basically started out as a party band because we loved playing, and that's the real key. Our philosophy is, 'Life's a big party,' but we're still very serious about writing great music."

"Our philosophy is 'Life's a big party,' but we're still very serious about writing great music."

Influences from the '70s ska movement are evident in Dynagroove's music. The English Beat, The Specials, and Sly and The Family Stone are a few of the band's favorites. Erik explained how he sees Dynagroove's music evolving. "The direction from the beginning was to have something with a danceable beat. We fell into the ska and funky rock thing. Lately we've been doing a lot of funky rock-n-roll, but we still do the ska thing."

Dynagroove is constantly working on new material, and recently the band collaborated with Tommy Conwell and Marcy Rauer. As Erik pointed out, "It's always good to get different input. Marcy wrote 'I'm Not Your Man' with Tommy Conwell and she has great insight on what makes a song work. Working with other writers helps prevent you from getting locked into your own ideas and it's a lot of fun."

Dynagroove is becoming more conscious of their lyrics as they progress. Erik said, "I've always had a lot of fun with lyrics, but now I take them more seriously. I still have fun with them, but you have to have something to say when you write a song. Since we now have Cornerstone Management taking care of the business aspects, we can just focus on our music, and we're better because of it."

Hopefully, we will be able to enjoy Dynagroove's music on vinyl in the near future. According to Erik, plans for an independent album are in the works. "In the next three to six months, we want to begin work on something. Now we're just getting songs together because a lot of our material works great in a live show as jams. We'd like to take some of that powerful beat element and put it into more songs than jams."

Dynagroove is very aware of the pros and cons of recording. Erik continued, "Sometimes when you're recording one track at a time, you don't get the same sort of spontaneity as you do on stage. Recording can be a lot better as far as finding the right sound and getting what we want on a mix. We'll be excited to put something out."

Erik feels very positive about the reception that local music has received in the Philadelphia area. "WMMR's Street Beat plays us and a lot of other area bands. Also, college radio is a cool market because all types of music are played there. College radio is geared to people who are really interested in music, so there are a lot of places where local music is heard."

Right now Dynagroove is playing music full-time and taking things step by step. The band is consistently drawing larger crowds and headlining at bigger clubs. Erik summed the band's attitude up with, "We've always played because we have a passion for music and not just because we want to be MTV stars. We work on keeping our show fresh, which can be hard when we're playing four nights a week. The main thing I care about is that people come to our shows and dance and have a good time."

In the past, Dynagroove has played with the likes of John Lee Hooker, Johnny Winter and The Neville Brothers. Erik recalled some other favorite gigs. "We love playing parties, and we have a lot of fun at the 23 East. We also have had some great times in our rehearsal studio, the DynaDump. It's an old warehouse with a big stage so we've had some cool jams with other musicians like Tommy Conwell and Nik Everett."

Whether it be at a beach party or at a Neville Brothers' concert, Dynagroove knows how to keep people moving their feet to that groovy beat. The best way for you to experience Dynagroove is not by reading an article, but by seeing the band for yourself. Dynagroove will be performing at the 23 East Cabaret tonight and tomorrow night, so check them out!

Tabloid TV takes over

By STEPHEN POWERS
Staff Reporter

Television evangelists, mail-order brides, celebrity scandals — these are just a few of the topics that regularly turn up on television's newest form: Tabloid TV. With the success of Morton Downey Jr.'s sensationalistic talk show, everyone is jumping on the bandwagon.

Downey started his show last year on WWOR, the New Jersey superstation. Abrasive and crude, he attracted a cult following and earlier this year, his show was syndicated nationally on a trial basis. The result was a hit, and success breeds imitators, which are appearing all around the dial:

"A Current Affair" is tabloid TV masquerading as "60 Minutes." Produced by Fox, it started off locally in New York, but eventually went into syndication. Each night, a team of reporters exploits a different topic — in depth, of course. This format has done so well that Fox is using it, and some of "Current Affair's" staff, for "The Reporters," a new Saturday night magazine.

Fox has also found an audience by turning its much-beleaguered "Late Show," into what programming executives describe as a "tabloid talk show," featuring subjects like UFO sightings and guests like Jessica Hahn. Fox, which just happens to be owned by publishing magnate Rupert Murdoch, recently made an agreement with The Star for exclusive previews of some of its stories to be used on "The Late Show."

As if this were not bad enough, Channel 57 just started broadcasting "Geraldo," with that master of quality journalism, Geraldo Rivera. Can "National Enquirer: The Television Show" be far behind?

MORE SHOCK TV: Another trend appearing this season is the return of the horror/anthology series. A few of these series are already airing, and will move to prime time in the coming weeks. Although it bears the same title as the slasher movies, "Friday the 13" actually has plots and a little imagination. Very little. Two cousins inherit an antique shop filled with cursed objects, and must recover the things that have already been sold. Stupid as it sounds, "Friday" can be fairly entertaining, and is better than some network programs.

As if this were not bad enough, Channel 57 just started broadcasting "Geraldo," with that master of quality journalism, Geraldo Rivera.

Joining "Friday" on Oct. 15, is another program based on a popular film series. "A Nightmare on Elm Street: Freddy's Nightmares" is an anthology of different horror stories, with the razor-fingered Freddy Krueger (Robert Englund) as host. Lorimar-Telepictures, the syndicator, has already been criticized for the reportedly violent show, which will air early in the evening and be watched by young children.

"War of the Worlds," and "The Twilight Zone" promise to be more tame. "War" is an update on the classic film, which in turn was based on Orson Welles' famous fictional radio broadcast. "Twilight," a revival of the popular 1960s series, is produced by the same people who did the CBS version two years ago.

VALERIE'S VERDICT: The battle between Valerie Harper and Lorimar-Telepictures, the producers of her old sitcom, seems to be over — at least for now. Last Friday, a jury found that Harper and husband Tony Caciotti, a co-executive producer, were wrongfully fired from the NBC comedy "Valerie" last year when she complained that the show was focusing too much on her teenage co-stars and not enough on her. Harper was awarded $1.85 million in general damages and 12.5 percent of the profits from the 1987-88 season of "Valerie's Family," in which she was replaced by Sandy Duncan.

While Harper will not return to the series (her character was killed off), she is busy working on a new television movie for NBC. Meanwhile, Lorimar is mulling over whether to appeal the court's decision.

SHORT TAKES: The Tanners, of the NBC sitcom "ALF," will soon add another member to their family. Anne Schedeen, who plays Kate, is pregnant, and her pregnancy will be written into the show ... Former "Late Show" host and "Coming to America" co-star Arsenio Hall returns to the talk show battleground in January with the syndicated "Arsenio Hall Show," which will go head-to-head with Johnny Carson and the new "Pat Sajak Show" in many markets ... Fans of the cancelled NBC series "St. Elsewhere," take heart — reruns of that show are now airing weeknights at 7 p.m. on Channel 57 ... "Saturday Night Live" returns for a 14th season with last year's entire cast on October 8. Tom Hanks hosts ... Next up for Whoopi Goldberg: a recurring role on "Star Trek: The Next Generation." She will play Guinan, the alien hostess of the Enterprise crew's recreational lounge.

Campers create new sound

By MICHAEL AIMETTE and BILL CARR
Staff Reporter

For What It's Worth

Beethoven's Fourth

There is a great new sound coming out of California — and no, it is not the metal invasion. Oh no. It is the completely refreshing sound of Camper Van Beethoven.

Combining a healthy dose of horns and violin (do not cringe) with straight forward guitar-based rock and roll, the Campers have come up with a sound that, while certainly borrowing from other bands, comes through as something all their own. And it is not just original, it is very good, particularly on their latest album, Our Beloved Revolutionary Sweetheart.

The fourth Camper Van Beethoven album marks a departure from the novelty-type songs that first got the Campers some attention. There are no songs like their first successful single, "Take The Skinheads Bowling." The band has not become less fun, though, just better.

On most of the album, Camper Van Beethoven juxtaposes a despairing sense of the evil realities of this life with a determined optimism that, in spite of these depressing truths, some happiness can still be found.

On "She Divines Water," lead singer David Lowery asks, "How can I believe that everything in this world is going to be fine?" Camper Van Beethoven is smart enough to know that it will not. It is also smart enough not to succumb to the limits of the typical "underground" doom and gloom attitude.

The Campers seem to be enjoying life even though it is not always a bed of roses.

Our Beloved Revoluntionary Sweetheart closes the song, "Life Is Grand" and the words: "And life is grand/And I'll say this at the risk of falling from favor/With those of you who ... expect/Us to say something darker." The Campers seem to be enjoying life even though it is not always a bed of roses.

Easter's "Day"

Every Dog Has His Day is the optimistic title of the third full length album by Let's Active, another California band, led by singer/guitarist/songwriter Mitch Easter. Easter is best known for his brilliant work with R.E.M., producing their only EP, Chronic Town, and their first two LPs, Murmur and Reckoning.

Besides his influence in the production studio, Easter is considered a visionary in the recording studio as well, writing relatively straightforward rock and roll songs. Unfortunately, his efforts have usually fallen on deaf ears. Let's Active's last record, Big Plans For Everybody hardly lived up to the album's hopeful title (at least commercially), though it was one of the best American albums of 1986.

The problem, of course, has nothing to do with the music, but the lack of promotion they received. As is true of many excellent groups, Let's Active seems destined to be dubbed "underground" and "artsy," though they are no more eccentric than any popular band, only better.

About the music. Influences (especially on this album) range from the Byrds to Led Zeppelin. Mitch Easter's voice is a bit high, almost effeminate on certain songs. The lyrics are generally encouraging; Easter has a knack for being happy without seeming too wimpy, witty without being too cerebral. All things considered, Every Dog Has His Day is an album worthy of Mitch Easter's considerable talents, and, in a just word, prophetic in its title ...

New Stuff

The long-dissolved Smiths have a live LP out, titled Rank. The song selection is interesting; primarily offering songs not found on the "greatest hits" package, Louder Than Bombs, or their final album Strangeways, Here We Come ... The Feelies released Only Love, and judging by this New Jersey band's first single, it is certainly worth a listen ... Tom Petty is set to release his first solo effort, Songs From The Garage ... They are back! Duran Duran is completing work on a triumphant comeback album.

Record Roundup . . . Pat Benatar, Furs

By JEFF GILLIES
Assistant Entertainment Editor

Wide Awake in Dreamland
Pat Benatar
Chrysalis Records

Pat Benatar has long been considered one of the leading ladies of rock and roll. She achieved this reputation by belting out some great straightforward scorchers such as "Hit me with your Best Shot" and "Promises in the Dark." Although she departed from this style on her last album, it appeared she had reverted to hard rock once again with the release of the single "All Fired Up." Unfortunately, Wide Awake In Dreamland fizzles out completely after the opening track.

"All Fired Up" is cleary a Benatar classic. Neil Geraldo's guitar rips through the song, giving it the hard edge and momentum that keeps the song from falling into the abyss of nothingness that consitutes the rest of the album.

There is not one other song, aside from "All Fired Up," worth mentioning on the first side.

Benatar is, vocally, at her best on "All Fired Up." She masterfully mixes her harsh screams with a soft, melodic tone that contrast beautifully within the song. The drumming is powerful and steady, accompanied by a bass line with the same characteristics. Simply put, "All Fired Up" is the perfect song to crank up on the stereo.

From here, Wide Awake In Dreamland becomes a series of slow ballads in which Benatar tries to sing like Heart's Ann and Nancy Wilson and falls flat on her face. The musical quality is extremely poor at times, and the style is a cross between a futile attempt to copy Springsteen's Tunnel of Love style and Heart's "These Dreams," with a touch of blues influence. There is not one song, aside from "All Fired Up," worth mentioning on the first side.

As if the first side is not bad enough, Side 2 is even worse. Beginning with a fast-paced, guitar-oriented rock song in the form of "Cool Zero" and then dying out completely, the side follows the exact format of Side 1. The title track is somewhat redeeming, but it is quite possible that one would not be able to sit through the album to the very end, and therefore, miss the song. Even so, "Wide Awake in Dreamland" is nothing for Benatar to be proud of, as it is only slightly better than the rest of the album. In this case, that is not saying much.

Hopefully, Benatar will overcome this disastrous release and get her career back on track. For now, Benatar fans are better off listening to her older material and buying the single "All Fired Up." Wide Awake In Dreamland leaves the listener wondering if Benatar was actually awake during the production.

All of This and Nothing
Psychedelic Furs
Columbia Records

All of This and Nothing is a good title for a best-of album by the Psychedelic furs. Actually, it is a good euphemism for the Furs' career, chronicled in their latest release. The album contains vintage material from their first three albums, plus what they could salvage from the last two. In short, it is a typical best-of album and really not a bad one at that.

There are a few things of interest on this album. First of all, the fact that the songs are not ordered chronologically, is an obvious ploy to hide the Furs' declie in recent years. The real surprise on this album, and a pleasant one at that, is "All That Money Wants," the only new song on the album. It is good in that it is reminiscent of early Fus' music and a large improvement over their recent work. Another good move on the part of the Furs was to include the original version of "Pretty in Pink" on the album as opposed to the soundtrack version. People who have never before heard it will be pleasantly surprised.

Of course, there could have been a better choice of material. Early Furs' classics like "India" and "Into You Like a Train" were omitted for the inclusion of later Furs' material. Still, it is a decent album on the whole, even with its rough spots, as well as being promising for early Psychedelic Furs fans.

Bruce EP

tion of problems and freedom for all. When he asks for freedom for "the warrior whose strength is not to fight," it is obvious that to Bruce, Amnesty is more than just the release of political prisoners.

The broader picture of world peace is the main point of the Boss' appeal. With his rendition of this Dylan song, he convincingly makes a statement. It is no wonder that this song has become the theme song of the tour.

The album is wrapped up with an acoustic version of a Bruce classic: "Born to Run." The slow tempo shifts the focus of the song to the lyrics and serves well to continue the serious mood of this album.

"Chimes of Freedom" is an album with a serious message and some very good music as well.

Men's tennis aced by Big East teams

By STEVE KIRSCH
Staff Reporter

The Villanova men's tennis team got off to a disappointing start this past weekend at the Big East Tournament in Weekapaug, R.I., with a fifth-place finish. Perennial Big East powerhouse Boston College, for the eighth-straight year, won the tourney, going away, with 40 points.

Providence and St. John's finished with 28 points apiece in a second-place tie, Georgetown was fourth with 24, the Cats fifth with 16, Pittsburgh sixth with 10, Connecticut seventh with 6 and Seton Hall brought up the rear as they were shut out.

The surprises spanned from top to bottom as Villanova's top seed Mike Rouse lost his first match to the eventual champ, No. 1 seed Chris Boyer of St. John's, 6-1, 6-3. Boyer, who joined the Redmen this year from France, shut down senior Rouse's powerful serve and volley game.

After winning the consolation semifinals, Rouse dropped the finals in a hotly contested, three-setter, 2-6, 6-4, 7-5 to Todd Farrin of U. Conn.

Second seed Taylor Teresi, a junior, lost in the quarterfinals to Paul Maben of Pittsburgh, 6-4, 3-6, 6-4. Teresi later won a consolation semifinal before dropping the consolation final to Valentin Stoiana, also of St. John's.

Mike Loughman, last year's freshman sensation, dropped his first match as the third seed to Leo Correa, another St. John's product, by a tough 6-4, 4-6, 6-3 score. After defeating Richard Lowther of Providence, 3-6, 7-6 (7-5), 7-6 (8-6) in the consolation semis, he defeated John Tegano of Pitt to win the consolation finals, 6-0, 6-1.

Steve Forrest, the team's newest addition from Burlington, Mass., won his inaugural Wildcat match as fourth seed by defeating Anthony Zorovich of Seton Hall, 7-5, 6-1. But he dropped his semifinal match to George Mautis, also of Seton Hall, 6-1, 7-5.

Junior Pete Leonard won his quarterfinal match against Doug Chase of Connecticut, 6-3, 6-4, but could not continue his success in the semis as he was tripped up by Paul Mandeville of Providence, 4-6, 7-5, 6-3.

A bright spot for the 'Nova men was Greg Ackerman at No. 6 singles. After losing his quarterfinal match, Ackerman defeated Matt Arciero of U. Conn., 6-7 (7-3), 6-1, and 6-2 in the consolation semifinals. He then went on, like Loughman, to capture the consolation finals by ripping Terry O'Connor of Pitt, 6-4, 6-2.

The first doubles team of Rouse and Forrest, and the second pairing of Teresi and Leonard each won their initial matches, 6-3, 6-3 and 6-3, 6-1, respectively. But in the semifinals, each team was defeated in straight sets.

The second-seeded team of Lowther and Mandeville from Providence went on to win the championship after defeating Teresi and Leonard.

The last accomplishment for the 'Nova men was another consolation championship, this time for the third doubles pair of junior John O'Dwyer and Ackerman. The duo defeated Greg Ceniglia and Scott Correll of Connecticut in straight sets.

Head Coach Dr. Robert Langran, said jokingly, "My comments aren't printable." Coach Langran went on to add that, "We played well, but still finished fifth." He admitted that he had expected a better showing as the Cats had finished second in the '87 Big East Tournament, the highest finish ever for Villanova at the tournament.

Coach Langran went on to point out that St. John's lost their No. 1 seed from last year only to replace him with "someone even better" in Boyer. He noted that B.C. is always good, year in and year out.

Georgetown also added a new No. 1 player, pushing all of their returnees from last year down a notch in the Hoya seedings. Finally, Providence added four new players for 1988-89, and Langran expects that all four can contribute for the Friars.

It should be noted that the Nova netters were without senior Mike Freedman, last year's No. 5 singles and No. 2 doubles semifinalist at the Big East tourney. Freedman was taking his medical school exams this past weekend.

The men's tennis team finished 5th in the Big East tournament last weekend. They were topped by Boston College, Providence, St. Johns and Georgetown.

Ron Sency — a coach's dream

By DOUG SCANCARELLA
Sports Editor

Being called the epitome of a team, especially of the Villanova football team, is a great honor for anybody. It is an honor Head Coach Andy Talley bestowed on his newly positioned wide receiver Ron Sency. The honor, in this case, fits perfectly.

Sency is the epitome of the Wildcat football team for many reasons: he is the V.U. all-time leading all-purpose yard gainer, the V.U. sixth all-time leading rusher and an academic All-American. Possibly the most important quality Sency possesses, however, is his unselfish attitude.

This unselfishness can be seen in Sency's attitude toward his off-season position change from tail-back to wide receiver.

"I think Ron's heart is still at running back, but he is a team player and took the switch as a positive move for the team," Talley said.

Though it is still early in the season, the move seems to be working out. Jeff Dingle, who replaced Sency at tailback, is playing tremendous football. Dingle, a sophomore, currently leads the Cats in rushing with 196 yards in two games.

Sency is also playing well. The senior caught three passes and returned three kickoffs for 64 yards. He does not see the ball as much as in previous years, but when he gets it he picks up key yardage.

"At first I was concerned with the move," Sency said. "I had never played wide receiver before, but I worked hard at it and when I got the hang of it, it helped the team because it gave us alot of much needed depth wide."

Sency attended Medina High School in Ohio. At Medina, he rushed for 3,765 career yards in three years at the varsity level. He attained all-state honorable mention, MVP of Medina County and MVP of the Southwest Conference honors. He was also named MVP of the team in his senior season.

Sency was looking for a solid academic school where he had a good chance to play as a freshman. Villanova was the obvious choice.

The football program at V.U. was just starting up in his freshman year and Sency made an immediate impact. He led the team in rushing with 322 yards in just five games in 1985.

In his sophomore year, Sency moved into the starting line-up, and led the Wildcats in rushing for the second straight year. In his junior year, he took over as 'Nova's all-time all-purpose yardage leader with 2,713 yards and sixth leading career rusher with 1,489 yards on the ground.

"I'm happy with my career here. This year I am just going to be a role player though, but I will participate any way I can. I enjoy getting the ball as much as possible." Sency said.

Another person that enjoys when Sency gets the ball is Talley, who said, "Ron is a great runner, receiver and special teams player. He does it all — he is a coaches dream."

Sency does everything in the classroom as well as on the field. As an electrical engineering major, he has a 3.09 grade point average and ranks as an academic All-American.

"Ron is a magnificent player to have on the team. He performs outstandingly both as a player and academically," concluded Talley.

Athlete of the Week

Laura Smelas

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is the women's tennis team's captain Laura Smelas.

Smelas, a senior, led the Cats past Drexel, St. Joseph's and West Chester for a title in the PAIAW tournament this past week at Villanova.

In the tourney, Smelas, who teamed with Jeannie O'Connor, captured her third consecutive PAIAW title in the first team doubles competition. She was also effective in the Wildcats 9-0 victory over Swarthmore last Tuesday.

X-Country run down

By MICHAEL E. JONES
Staff Reporter

The Villanova Women's Cross Country team officially kicked off its season on Sept. 16 at the Fordham University Invitational, and several new names and faces emerged in the process. Much to the pleasure of the competition, the Wildcats were without the services of the very familiar arsenal of seniors Vicki Huber, Kathy Franey, Celeste Halliday and Michelle DiMuro.

Huber has run throughout the entire summer, and is presently on the other side of the world in Seoul awaiting the Olympic 3000-meters qualifying heats. She will be redshirted during the 1988 cross country season.

Teammates Franey, Halliday, DiMuro, and sophomore Sonia O'Sullivan, who have similarly run hard throughout the summer, will follow suit and sit out this season as well.

The reins were handed over to a relatively young and inexperienced squad, but in the words of Assistant Coach Michael Bellarosa, "We ran what we expected for the first meet of the year, and there will definitely be improvement as the season progresses. It was a good overall team effort."

Sophomore transfer Kim Certain was the first Wildcat to cross the finish line, completing the 5000-meter course in 18:25.46, which placed her fourth overall. "Kim looked outstanding," commented Bellarosa. "Nineteen minutes is a good time for that course — the winning time was just under 19 minutes last year."

Fellow sophomore Kate Fonshell was the next Wildcat, finishing 10th overall in 18:56.44. The next two Wildcats over the finish line, sophomore Carol Haux and freshman Michelle Torelli, finished 21st and 22nd, with respective times of 19:48.22 and 19:48.91.

Sophomore Tara Kennedy was next, placing 28th in 19:57.20. Junior Elaine Duck was 34th in 20:10.96, and freshman Sheila Devanson finished 52nd in 31:19.04.

Bellarosa continued, "The girls have a positive outlook and will only get better. Kate ran one of her best races in collegiate competition, and Michelle will undoubtedly be a good one. She ran extremely well in her first collegiate competition."

Huber survives mishaps

Vicki Huber, Villanova's Olympic track star, had a rough time just making it to Seoul. She was involved in a minor car accident the night before leaving for South Korea, although no injuries were sustained. Huber's woes continued as her luggage was lost by her airline in Japan, and her team uniforms were subsequently stolen from her training residence.

Women's Tennis

The Villanova women's tennis team swept the PAIAW tournament held at Villanova, Sept. 18. The Cats captured the individual titles in the second singles, third singles, first doubles and second doubles, while collecting 19 points and the victory. The team's closest rivals were Drexel with 12.5 points, and St. Joseph's with 10.

Women's Soccer

Women's soccer, the defending ECAC champions, got off to a bad start, as they lost one and tied two on the road last week. Aldelphi took the Cats into overtime with a 1-1 tie, and both teams scored in the extra period to end the match with the score 2-2. Freshman goalie Karen Del Sarto registered nine saves in the contest.

Boston College managed a 1-0 win over the Cats on Sept. 17, despite being outshot 11-6. Poor defense also contributed to the Sept. 18 match against Providence, who tied the Wildcats 2-2 in overtime. Villanova held a 23-5 advantage in shots in the tie.

Hockey derailed

This series exposed the Cats main weakness: a young defensive team. "We really lost out on defense this year, as we have a young, inexperienced squad," commented Massaro.

Lehigh and Boston College were both allowed to take twice as many shots as the Wildcats and U. Penn racked up an impressive seven to one shot margin. Only the solid play of goalie Mary Monahan prevented larger scores from being posted against the Cats.

"Mary will definitely be one of our dominant players this season," stated Massaro. Monahan has made 87 saves in seven games thus far, with a .906 save percentage and three shutouts.

After dropping three straight, the Cats arrived at Providence eager to end their streak. But the bad play continued as Providence scored two goals within a minute and a half of each other, and followed that performance with a third score 10 minutes later.

However, the Wildcats battled that 3-0 deficit and countered with three unassisted goals in the second period. Sam Brindley, Ann Dickey and Tory Rife each knocked one in for Villanova to even the score and force an overtime period.

With play that conjured up images of an earlier 0-0 tie with Lafayette, neither team was able to score during the extra time, and a second overtime period began.

The tired Providence players managed to attempt six shots to Villanova's one in the final minutes, but failed to score and the match was recorded as a 3-3 tie.

Volleyball hammered

By MONICA BYRNE
Staff Reporter

According to first-year Head Coach Dave Barkley, the women's volleyball team is "showing progress." After losing to Delaware on Sept. 14 (14-16, 7-15, 12-15), in what Barkley termed "the most disappointing game so far," the 'Cats turned around and held their own against some talented teams in the William and Mary tournament on Sept. 16-17.

Captained by Debbie Opitz and Karen Fraser, 'Nova entered its second tournament of the year, hoping to repeat the solid performance displayed in the Syracuse tourney, which opened the season.

After being defeated in three games by an impressive William and Mary team, the Cats regrouped to competitively match Virginia. But 'Nova lacked the "knockout punch," as Coach Barkley phrased it, and eventually fell in three games, (14-16, 12-15, 11-16).

The loss came despite the efforts of setter Hillary Anderson, and hitters, Andrea Perez and Lisa Stevanovic, who combined for 19 kills.

The Wildcats then came together for their third attempt of the weekend at victory, and this time, were successful. Led by Perez, Stevanovic and Fraser, the Cats captured their win in four games (15-11, 15-8, 6-15, 15-12).

Barkley would like to see his team "enjoy the competition, not struggle with it, have fun with the last few points of each game, and reach its goal of peak performance."

The Cats are in action again this weekend at Penn State for a difficult tourney with the Nittany Lions, Memphis State and Maryland.

Golf opens

By BRUCE ALBANESE

Sophomore Jeff Osler led the Villanova golf team to a 12th-place finish at the West Point Invitational on the weekend of Sept. 9-11.

The three-day tournament, which included 25 teams from the greater northeast area, was won by Army which shot an impressive 873. Villanova's three-day total of 933 was well off the pace, but good enough for a 12th-place standing in a competitive tournament.

Before the final day, there was a three-way tie for ninth between Providence, Skidmore and Villanova. However, the course got the better of the Wildcat linksters as Providence and Skidmore edged out the Cats by one and two strokes respectively on the last day.

Throughout the three-day tournament, the players were treated to ideal golfing conditions, with temperatures in the mid to upper 70's and only a slight breeze. However, Osler, Nova's No. 1 man, said that, "As a team, we had a lot of problems adjusting to the slick greens and mountainous layout of the course." To sum it all up succinctly, Jeff said, "We just weren't used to it."

Osler appeared to have no problems though, as he turned in a 54-hole total of 225 (83-70-72) to finish 10th in the individual running. Coach Don Ficco, although happy with Osler's performance, was disappointed on the whole.

Golf Head Coach Don Ficco

Osler responded with a few words about Ficco's expectations for the upcoming season. "We're looking to have a good year and this tournament overall was a little disappointing because St. John's, our rival, finished third."

The Redmen shot a blistering 880, only seven shots off the pace and well in front of Villanova. If Villanova wants to contend for the Big East title and perform on the level that they expect, Osler will have to continue his inspiring play, and the rest of the team must follow his lead.

Wildcat soccer falls to 2-3-1

By JOE GUARINO
Staff Reporter

The Wildcat men's soccer team suffered two setbacks this week, including their first Big East conference defeat. They closed out the week with a victory at Rider College.

The Cats first faced Seton Hall, the eighth ranked team in the country and defending Big East conference champion. Despite repeated acrobatic saves by senior co-captain and goalie Ron Klos, the Wildcats fell short, 2-0. This left the team with a record of 0-1 in the Big East and 1-2-1 overall.

Haverford traveled down the Main Line to meet the Wildcats at Villanova Stadium on Sept. 17. The Fords jumped on Villanova early by tallying a goal with only 4:34 gone in the first half.

By the middle of the second half Haverford led 3-0.

Senior co-captain and defensive player, Jim Cowan, scored his first career goal at 32:13 of the second half but the Wildcats were defeated by a score of 3-1.

Villanova controlled the offensive game, outshooting Haverford 13-4 however they were simply unable to capitalize on various scoring opportunities. The Cats fell to 1-3-1 overall with the loss.

The squad was looking to get back on track on Sept. 19 against Rider College. Their young defense played well early, and 'Nova tallied two first half goals.

Sophomore Pete Armstrong scored the first goal at 21:05. At 34:46, freshman Steve Raffellini netted his team-leading third goal of the season. The Wildcats were victorious, 2-1.

Goalie Klos gathered six saves, while giving up only one goal. The team now stands at 2-3-1 overall, 0-1 in the Big East.

The Wildcats now have a one-week break until they travel to Temple University Sept. 28.

On the Ball

By JOHN F. SWIFT
Assistant Sports Editor

Here is a hypothetical situation. Suppose you are a boxer and you have been working most of your life toward a dream. That dream is apparently realized when you are selected to represent your country in the Olympics.

You then proceed to travel thousands of miles to a country that eats "man's best friend" over rice. On the day of your first bout, you arrive late for the fight because your coach did not read the schedule properly. You are disqualified and become the laughing stock of the games for something that apparently is not your fault. Who is to blame?

As you probably have guessed, this is not a hypothetical situation. This scenario occurred last week in Seoul, South Korea, when a United States boxer, Anthony Hembrick, was disqualified from the event for not being on time for his bout.

The philosophy of this type of situation is that the athlete's only concern is his performance and all other details are the responsibility of the coaching staff. On the boxing team, for example, the coaching staff takes turns getting fighters to the arena.

The person who was assigned to get Hembrick to the arena happened to be the head coach of the team, Ken Adams. Thus, the blame rests on the shoulders of coach Adams and on nobody else's.

Hembrick was not the only person disappointed by Adams' negligence, an entire nation was let down. As a representative of the United States of America, Hembrick should have been at the arena to represent us.

Since his coach's incompetence resulted in a national embarrassment, I feel Coach Adams should be removed from his post immediately.

Isn't that a bit harsh for just one blunder? Absolutely not.

At an event such as the Olympics, our country is on display to the rest of the world through the athletes and coaches we send to represent us. These athletes and coaches are, in effect, agents of our nation.

To tolerate such irresponsible behavior without punishment would, in essence, be similar to condoning it. I do not know about you, but I would hope that we could find someone a bit more diligent than Coach Adams to represent us.

Furthermore, it isn't like it takes a rocket scientist to read an events schedule. This point is illustrated by the number of other nations that had trouble with the boxing schedule — zero.

I am not saying that perfection by our athletes and coaches is the only acceptable form of behavior. Certain mistakes, such as having an off day in the ring, are allowable.

However, carelessness and plain stupidity make our nation look ridiculous and must never be tolerated by people who wear our colors.

I sympathize with Hembrick. He is only a victim of a system that must be evaluated. Coach Adams, on the other hand, represents what must be avoided when we put ourselves on display in the international arena.

If this unfortunate incident serves to prevent such atrocities from occurring in the future, then that must be our consolation.

Talley expects aerial circus

Villanova's Greg Downs must play an important role if the Cats are to down B.U. this Saturday.

By JOHN G. RICCO
Sports Editor

So much for the old adage that defense wins games. The topic on the minds of Head Coaches Andy Talley and Chris Palmer heading into this Saturday's Villanova-Boston University game is offense.

Palmer, in his initial season at B.U., has transformed a once conservative Terrier ballclub into a "run-and-gun" passing team.

"People say we're an offensive club," said Talley. "Well, we look like three yards and a cloud of dust compared to them (Boston University)."

Indeed, Villanova (1-1), widely known as a high-scoring team, pales offensively in comparison with Palmer's Terriers (1-1). In last week's 23-13 loss to James Madison, B.U. set team passing records for both completions (30) and attempts (59) while amassing 230 yards through the air.

For those who saw V.U. beat a run-oriented Boston U last year, 14-7 at Villanova Stadium, do not be mislead. The Terriers have changed. "This is a different Boston University team this year," Talley said. "They have a lot of weapons. I've been very impressed by them."

The man most responsible for this 180-degree change is Palmer. Previously head coach at New Haven, Palmer brought the run and shoot offense with him when he joined B.U. earlier this year.

Though his team was open to the change, they have not yet perfected the explosive offense. "We're not really where we want to be yet," said Palmer. "It takes about a year to fully implement the system. Our kids are working hard and are having fun with it."

Despite B.U.'s high-powered offense, Talley is not about to change his game plan to accommodate the Terriers. Villanova will attempt to beat offense with more offense. "We want to stay wide open offensively and go point for point with them," said Talley. "We're not going to try and control the ball against them."

With these two philosophies meeting head on, this game should be a classic.

Defensively, the Terriers present another problem for the Wildcats. Led by 1st team Division IAA All-American defensive back Mark Seals, the Boston U. defensive lineup is solid.

"B.U.'s defense is coming along nicely," said Talley. "Starting with Seals and the defensive backfield, plus their 4-3 look, the defense compliments the new offense well ... B.U. is a serious football team."

Indeed, Saturday's game in Boston will be exciting. It marks Villanova's official entry into the Yankee Conference and thus takes on added importance for the Cats.

"It's really a big game because it's the beginning of the Yankee Conference for real," said Talley. "It's an opportunity to prove we're a contender for the conference title, that we're a quality team that can play."

Water Polo sinks foes in Eastern Tournament

By KATHY BIELOMYZA
Staff Reporter

The Villanova water polo team opened its 1988 season last weekend with two impressive victories in the Eastern Varsity Tournament held at the United States Naval Academy in Annapolis, Maryland.

On Sept. 17, the team split a double-header as they beat Princeton 6-3 before falling to the University of Massachusetts, 10-7.

In the team's first match, freshman goalie Steve Abbott denied nine of 12 shots on goal as the Cats thrashed Princeton. Villanova displayed a dynamic defense and the scoring was evenly distributed among Michael Klarin, Farshad Charmforoosh and Matthew Morris, as each netted two goals.

The Tigers were robbed of the match as the Wildcats came up with 11 steals during regulation play.

Against U. Mass., senior James Riley led the Cats' attack with three goals and three assists while adding one steal and one kick out to the defensive effort.

Starters Klarin, Engstrom, Charmforoosh and Morris contributed one goal each, but this was not enough to overcome the scoring power of the Minutemen.

On Sept. 18, the team found themselves in a tight match with Slippery Rock. Down 2-1 in the first quarter, the Cats were able to score three times, leading to a 4-4 tie at the half. With the strong offensive play of Riley, who was responsible for four of Villanova's goals, the Wildcats fought their way to a 6-5 victory.

Looking forward to continuing their winning streak, the team will face Princeton at home on Oct. 5.

Field Hockey Coach Cheryl Massaro

Defense destroys hockey

By AMY C. SPENCER
Assistant Sports Editor

When Field Hockey Head Coach Cheryl Massaro was asked what she expected from last week's road trip, she unhesitatingly replied, "Victories." However, the trip provided anything but wins, as the Cats dropped three games and tied one, lowering their season record to 2-3-2.

After shutting out their opponents in the first three games this season, the Wildcats failed to score in the second three games. Lehigh beat Villanova 1-0, the University of Pennsylvania won 2-0, and Boston College smothered the Cats 3-0. This downward trend was finally halted when Villanova scored three goals against Providence on Sept. 18, en route to a 3-3 overtime tie.

Parents' Weekend officially starts today with events planned through Sunday.

Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities, said that although the Student Activities office plans Parents' Weekend, "I'd really like to commend the two groups who have taken care of all the details for the weekend — the Blue Key [Society] organization and the Villanova Union."

Gorski said parents are welcome to attend classes all day today.

At 7 p.m., the men's soccer team will play St. Joseph's University in Villanova Stadium.

Other athletic highlights include the football game tomorrow at 1:30 p.m., when Villanova hosts the University of Rhode Island.

One of the non-athletic affairs will be the parents' after-dinner reception/dance in the Connelly Center tonight beginning at 9 p.m. Tickets should have been purchased through the mail.

The whole center will open so people can move between the three performance areas. A flute and harp duet will be located in the main lobby while the Bellé Air Terrace will be the location of a coffee-house musical group.

Date rape at Villanova

By NOEL E. FALCO and JENNIFER REIDY
News Editors

[Editor's note: Names have been changed to protect the identities of the persons involved].

Scene one: After attending a fraternity party, Tina left with a male friend she had dated in the past. The two had both been drinking beer at the party, but neither was drunk. Once at his apartment in Ardmore, Tina thought she overheard her friend, Jim, talking long-distance with a friend, saying he was "trying to get over on some girl."

Tina remembered him as a warm, sincere and caring person from their previous dates. She still had feelings for him and thought things might get intimate, but did not have sex in mind. She told Jim this before they were together.

Jim, however, tried to force her into sex mentally and physically. As he laid on top of her and tried to force her legs apart, he said, "You know you want to ... I know you want it." She struggled to push him off and began to cry. Jim tried to subdue her, but she continued to put up a fight.

In disgust, Jim gave up. A distressed Tina tried to talk to Jim and ask him why he had treated her so differently and so disrespectfully. He said in response, "I don't know what you're talking about" and proceeded to pass out. Tina called her roommate every five minutes for two hours in order to get a ride home.

"I just wanted to get away," Tina said. "He made me feel worthless and small and used."

The next time Tina saw Jim he did not acknowledge her or inquire about how she had gotten home.

Scene two: In her freshman year, Jill heard that a friend, Sue, had been date raped in Sullivan Hall. Sue had been drinking and had passed out on a bed offered to her by a male friend. After Sue collapsed, her friend, Mike, took advantage of her while another friend looked on. When Mike was finished, this friend, too, took his turn.

Jill heard of this from someone who heard the two men bragging of the deed. At first she thought Sue was responsible for putting herself in the situation, but after reflection she realized that no woman asks or wants to be raped.

Sue never talked about it and Jill was afraid to ask.

The Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, said Sept. 16 that acquaintance rape happens at Villanova University "more than we'd like to think."

"I have a sense that it happens a lot, probably more off-campus, but it does happen on [campus] as well," Stack said.

Stack added that in the seven years he has held his position there has been only one reported case of "supposed" rape.

Chief Rowan P. Kelly, director of Security, said recently that there has been no reported case of date rape or any rape on the Villanova campus in the seven years he has been employed here.

Radnor House in conflict with freshman residents

Freshmen were advised of responsibilities, said Stack

By KEVIN C. HEIL
Assistant News Editor

Radnor House condominum complex in Rosemont has been forced to change security and fining policies because of "unacceptable behavior" by Villanova students who live there, said Lisa Nordell, director of the complex.

Nordell said part of the problem is freshman residents, who have chosen to live in Radnor House due to a larger-than-expected freshman enrollment and a subsequent lack of on-campus housing.

The Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A. dean of students, said no freshman who received a housing contract was denied residency.

The excess of freshmen came from a greater number of commuters, off-campus residents and students who chose to attend, even though they would not receive housing. In addition, more accepted students chose to enroll than the University had expected, he said.

"As clearly as we spell it out to them ahead of time [that they will not receive on-campus housing] people always think it's going to work out some way. A lot of them make it, but there are as many who have a real tough time adjusting because they don't feel part of the school. Yet, ahead of time, they think, 'Villanova is what I want, so I'm going to make it work,' " Stack explained.

Nordell said she has met with

Lewis speaks of plans and agenda in interview

By ROGER B. McCURDY II

John Lewis, Student Government president-elect, said he plans to continue the progress in the University Senate which was begun by former president Joe Allman.

Lewis, a senior commerce and finance student with a concentration in marketing and an Honors minor, won the position of president last week after his nearest competitor, Sean Closkey, conceded the election.

Lewis, who served as student senator and worked extensively on the University Senate budget committee, had originally planned to leave Student Government for his senior year, and did not run in the original presidential election in April.

After the confusion of the nullified April election and Lewis' work for the government during the summer, Lewis said he felt he could best continue the progress of Student Government.

"We have to be a unified team," said Lewis, "in order to challenge the administration and the University." Lewis added that people such as Michelle Ciccolo, who had supported Sean Closkey's presidential bid, will hold positions of power within his organization.

Lewis said that in the past the University student senators were not up to date with the issues at hand. In effect, most were not even sure exactly how the Senate worked, he said.

Because of former president Allman, however, the senators over the past two years have been much better prepared and have had a much better chance to make a difference in the University, said Lewis.

"The students are the driving force behind change in the University," said Lewis.

Lewis said that one major problem still remains with the Senate.

Professor speaks on drinking laws

By KARLA BECKNER
Staff Reporter

Officially it is called House Bill number 668 of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania. More commonly, it is the new law on underage drinking that passed through the Pennsylvania House of Representatives on Nov. 18, 1987, and went into effect on May 23, 1988.

The process for the bill began approximately five years ago when members of the House asked Dr. Arthur Shuman, pre-law advisor and a business law professor at LaSalle University, and William Ryan, district attorney of Delaware County, to draft the legislation. The bill met with some resistance, including a veto by former Gov. Richard Thornburgh, but was reintroduced when Gov. Robert Casey took office.

The bill, once again, was hanging in limbo until a young man at Rutgers University drank himself to death last fall. Six days after that incident, the bill passed through the legislature.

"Hell hath no fury like an hysterical legislature," Shuman said at a lecture at LaSalle University on Sept. 20. "In fact, they were so sure that this bill was going to pass that they tacked the new abortion control act onto it as an amendment because they were sure that way it would

Dobbin says Class of 1989 to have unified graduation

By BARBARA KRESCH
Staff Reporter

The graduation ceremony for the class of 1989 will be unified, as decided by the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, said Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life.

The Baccalaureate Mass will be held on Sat., May 13, in the duPont Pavilion. The graduation ceremony will be held Sun., May 14, in Villanova Stadium, said Christine Lysionek, assistant to the dean of students.

Dobbin also decided to have one prominent guest speaker instead of having multiple speakers, as in the past. He has set up a committee to recruit the speaker, headed by Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice president for academic affairs, said Lysionek.

"There seemed to be more student interest [in a unified graduation], and lacking any compelling reason to have four smaller ceremonies, unified graduation was decided upon" even though there were pros and cons on both sides, said Neville.

He said that one of the factors in the decision was the interest of the student graduation committee, run by senior Vicki DiStefano.

Neville said he welcomed the opinions of the students and hopes to include their voice in the planning of next year's graduation.

A rain plan has not yet been determined. "Calling off the graduation is not acceptable to anyone" in case of rain, said Lysionek. She said that if necessary, the ceremony will be moved into the duPont Pavilion and the number of guests will be limited.

Future shuttle flight may hold V.U. students' experiment

By LYNNAE BOROWSKI
Staff Reporter

On a future flight, the U.S. space shuttle may carry experiments created by Villanova students, if a current University program is successful.

The Villanova University Space Shuttle Experiments Program was formed four years ago with a $500 grant from RCA. This grant reserved a space for the program's experiments on a flight scheduled for 1990, according to Karl Zimmer, professor of mechanical engineering and director of the program.

The group, however, has to raise $10,000 to pay NASA to send the experiment up on the shuttle. An additional $40,000 is needed for materials, supplies and transportation.

The organization is also looking for a place to work. The project is currently in boxes in the basement of Tolentine Hall.

The group is comprised of engineering, business, English and science majors who meet weekly to discuss preliminary tests, results, fund raising and future planning.

The organization is working on two experiments under the direction of Zimmer. "These experiments are still in the early design phase and it will be at least two years before they will be able to go up in the shuttle," said Manager Tom Janisch, a graduate student.

The first experiment involves the fabrication of a polymer in microgravity. "We are exploring to see if we can come up with a polymer experiment with better characteristics," explains Zimmer.

The polymer experiment is designed to produce nylon 6-6 in a microgravity environment. A more uniform, crystalline structure should result with superior chemical and physical properties without gravitational forces, said Chris O'Brien in an article in Supernova, a student publication.

The second is a vapor phase change experiment. This is the investigation of film condensation and evaporation in microgravity, said Zimmer.

Under normal conditions on Earth, the water evaporates and forms bubbles on the inside of a closed container. As the bubbles condense, they run down the sides of the container and become water.

In microgravity the evaporating water forms a lump and floats in the container. The question the group wants to answer is: "In microgravity, how does vapor condense on the walls?"

General Motors, 3M and duPont are also working on these experiments, which allows the students to compare their work with that of corporations. 3M and duPont's answers on the vapor phase change experiment conflict with those the University has found.

Repeating the experiments to prevent problems during the flight is one of the organization's current concerns. "We want to repeat the experiments here several times, so we are sure that it will work when we send it up," said Zimmer.

The presence of microgravity is the only factor which makes conducting the experiment in space different from Earth testing.

When the experiment is sent into space, it will be placed in a canister and mounted inside the space shuttle. This presents a problem, because the project must be workable in any position, said Zimmer.

Zimmer and Janisch attended the fifth Annual Get-Away Special Symposium this week at Cape Canaveral. Both were in attendance for the shuttle lift-off. Janisch presented a paper titled "Computerized Monitoring and Control of Experiments in Space." This marks the third consecutive year that Villanova sent students to the symposium.

Writing workshop to be held

Villanova University will be the site of the two-day "How to Write for Publication" workshop on Oct. 28 from 6 to 10 p.m. and Oct. 29 from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m.

The purposes of the workshop are to encourage writers and potential authors to write for personal or professional growth and to provide the knowledge and skills to successfully submit a manuscript for publication.

Workshop director is Dr. Ray Heitzmann a Villanova faculty member and published author of books, booklets and journal, magazine and newspaper articles. He and author Dr. Richard Borkowski will conduct the workshop, along with two workshop graduates, free-lance writer Ginny Gruerio and Dr. Trudy Rosenthal a psychotherapist and writer of numerous articles and a book.

College of Nursing receives grant

The University's College of Nursing received $105,565 from the U.S. Public Health Service's Division of Nursing to support a program in community and home health nursing administration.

The sum is the second installment of a three-year grant. The college must reapply for the grant each year.

Dr. Claire Manfredi, nursing professor, will direct the grant, which is being used to implement the community and home health nursing administration subspecialty of the master of science in nursing degree program.

The grant is the first of its kind in the United States to prepare nurses for administrative roles in community and home health care.

Education director named

Dr. Robert D. Stokes of Berwyn has been approved director of Continuing Education at the University.

His appointment was announced by Dr. Angelo Armenti, dean of University College. The Office of Continuing Education operates under the auspices of University College.

Prior to the appointment, Stokes served for six years as director of the University's Career Development Center, working with students, alumni and employers in both career development and placement.

In his new position, he is responsible for managing and developing non-credit certificate programs for a varied clientele interested in professional advancement and personal enrichment.

Continuing Education offers several training-oriented programs, including: BRIDGES, a series of business courses for liberal arts majors; American Management Association courses; and paralegal training.

New programs include an ethnic series of seminars on Irish, Polish, German and Italian culture, and courses in sign language and counseling skills.

Communities complain of Villanova students

By MAUREEN STAPLETON
Staff Reporter

The relationship between Villanova University and the surrounding communities is "strained as a result of an influx of students" residing in these communities, according to Tom Banner, township manager of Haverford.

Bob Crofford, township manager of Radnor, said he understood why there was an increase in freshman enrollment, "but the timing could not have been worse." He said, "Last spring, there was a decent amount of progress with the residents," but felt that this progress could be inhibited by the increase in enrollment.

"It was not the original intent that the University would accept so many freshmen. There was no under-the-table move to accept more people against the wishes of Radnor Township," said Arline Kerrigan, secretary of external affairs in Student Government.

Chief Maurice Hennessy of Radnor Township said, "Students portray a bad image for all of Villanova by the actions [they] do in the community." He cited examples of underage drinking, zoning violations and parking problems.

Kerrigan said, "Most students act responsibly, but a small minority act up ... it is these students that are set up as the Villanova example."

Banner said, "Students should be made aware that this is not a picnic. They're not here to raise hell."

Crofford said that he felt Student Government had helped the relationship between the township and the University, but added, "when the students live here, they are part of the community ... residents want to keep a fair amount of sanity."

The complaints that the township managers have to deal with usually concern housing code violations or excessive noise. Banner cited an example of a trumpet playing at 3 a.m.

He added that the complaints he received about students usually concerned Villanova students. Banner said he did not have problems with students from either Bryn Mawr College or Haverford College.

Crofford said he receives complaints about students. He said, "It [doesn't] necessarily have to be Villanova University [students], [but] the fact is that it's the biggest institution."

Violations of drinking laws are problems that must be dealt with, according to both Hennessy and Banner.

Hennessy said that "raids" made on Main Line drinking establishments are not directed toward Villanova students. He said, "It is the breaking of the law that is being pursued. We're not out to embarrass Villanova University."

Banner said that any Pennsylvania school should have a very strict policy concerning underage drinking. He said that the University should step in because students are "violating the laws, which [is] not in keeping with University policies."

A violation by a student of either an alcohol law or zoning code should result in the removal of that student from the University, Banner said. Considering the number of applicants the University has been receiving, getting rid of 100 bad apples would be better for the commuity," he said.

Students that have violated laws, said Kerrigan, "should be disciplined by the community ... [off-campus] students' actions are not the responsibility of the University."

Main Line homes.

The relationship that Villanova has with the surrounding communities is different compared to other universities which are in residential areas, Crofford said. "One of the differences is that Villanova is in the center of an affluent residential community. There is concern to protect the quality of life," he commented.

Kerrigan said, "Because they [the residents] have more money, they have more resources to use ... they feel that it is their community ... it's a tolerance that they let us stay here."

There is a "balancing act" that Crofford said he must perform to keep both the students and the residents happy. "We do not go out of our way to harass students. There seems to be a misunderstanding of what is going on in the township," he said.

He added, "The student population does good things ... but very little word of that gets out. I think that if the University made itself a little more obvious as a neighbor, that would help. A little of that goes a long way in a relationship."

Bush - a president for education?

By College Press Service

"I have been going around the country saying that I want to be known as the 'education president,'" Vice President George Bush said during a campaign stop in California this summer. "The reason is simple. Opportunity is what America is all about, and education is the key to opportunity."

An educated workforce, Bush believes, is the key to a prosperous economy. To prepare that workforce, he promises more student aid, plans to help families save for their children's education and programs to bring more minority students to campuses.

He says his U.S. Department of Education would avoid the confrontational style of President Ronald Reagan's Education Department under William Bennett.

And while all that might sound very attractive to a national college community buffeted by eight years of budget cuts and White House criticism, a lot of people in higher education think Bush is full of bunk.

Bush "will do whatever his advisors tell him to do to get elected. Hell, it's politics," said Dr. Robert Clodius of the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges.

While Dr. Aims McGuiness of the Education Commission of the States thinks "you can take the Vice President at his word: he wants to be the education president," he wonders whether Bush would take the political heat of funding college programs at the expense of defense, for example.

"Whoever is elected president has to face three major problems," McGuiness said. "They will have to deal with the budget and trade deficits, the high priority placed on defense spending and the commitment to entitlements for older people, such as Social Security."

"He can't do anything [about education] if he doesn't address those problems first."

Bush and Dukakis seek improvements in education

By HALLIE ZIMMERMAN
Staff Reporter

While at a safe distance from the passion and controversy that surrounds issues such as abortion, the Strategic Defense Initiative and the death penalty, education remains in the forefront of the 1988 presidential campaigns.

Both candidates agree that the lower and upper levels of the American educational system need improvement.

Once again, however, the ways that Gov. Michael Dukakis and Vice President George Bush seek to accomplish these ends are strikingly different.

On the grade school and high school levels Bush has, since 1964, favored "a Constitutional amendment which would permit prayer within the nation's schools ... as an extension of our commitment to teaching values."

Dukakis opposes school prayer.

Bush's highly publicized criticism of Dukakis for vetoing a bill that would require grade schoolers to say the Pledge of Allegiance indicates another difference. Bush explained this spring that "We are one nation under God. Our kids should say the Pledge of Allegiance."

As in the case with school prayer, Dukakis holds such legislation to be unconstitutional.

Dukakis and Bush both speak of improving the quality and quantity of teachers in the public school system.

Dukakis says he will establish a National Teaching Excellence Fund to recruit and retain outstanding teachers for America's schools. The fund will be financed with a first-year investment of $250 million.

The new fund will supplement efforts already underway at the state and local levels to recognize the work of exceptional teachers. Furthermore, it will provide incentives, such as scholarships, to attract top students to the teaching profession.

The National Teaching Excellence Fund will also encourage businesses to make mid-career placement of their employees in the teaching profession for three to five years of service.

With the fund, Dukakis plans to launch "a new National Teachers Corps, a domestic Peace Corps for teaching that can "inspire, galvanize, and harness the power and potential of a new generation of teachers directly out of our liberal arts colleges and universities."

The fund will help to expand programs that reward and recognize talented teachers and will be used with the newly developed National Teaching Stardards Board to establish a higher degree of teacher competence.

Both candidates agree that the lower and upper levels of the American educational system need improvement.

While in Congress and the Senate, Bush sponsored and cosponsored a number of major teacher improvement legislative acts. He co-sponsored the Student Teachers Corps Act, which provided for the recruitment of volunteer student tutors to aid in poverty-stricken areas. He also supported legislation involving salary increases of 19.2 percent over a two-step period for Washington, D.C. teachers.

Bush says that successful teachers must be rewarded. "Our teachers and principals are talented and able. But many of them toil for long hours and get little recognition. If we want better performance out of our schools, we must reward it," he said.

Bush has outlined several major proposals in the course of the 1988 campaign that would make up part of his national education strategy. He proposed creating a new $500 million federal program of "Merit Schools" which would provide awards to individual schools that improve the education of its students.

Bush supports proposals giving $50 million to states for federal matching funds creating more magnet schools, which are designed to promote excellence and upgrade the quality of their school systems.

Furthermore, Bush proposes expanding a new federal fund to $50 million and providing about $1 million to each state that selects one school district for experimentation in order to finance experiments in education reform.

On the college level, Dukakis and Bush have both focused on the problem of higher education affordability.

Dukakis has made his commitment to "the fundamental principle that no youngster who completes high school, is qualified to do college-work and is admitted to college, should ever be denied that opportunity because of financial need." He proposes three major steps.

First, Dukakis would increase funds toward Pell Grants and college work loans. Second, he will encourage state governments to create college opportunity funds and tuition prepayment plans which will allow parents to pay into a special, "interest-bearing trust that pools parents' contributions and makes long-range investments.

The third and most comprehensive part of Dukakis' plan is his goal to design an Education Insurance Fund that will allow students to repay their college loans through payroll withholding. This will be done according to a schedule proportionate to future earnings.

Bush's proposal entails the creation of a College Savings Bond. Such a bond would allow tax-free growth if used for college education. These bonds would also be interest-bearing.

Daniel T. Regan, profesor of peace and justice education, said that the Dukakis and Bush college proposals are "clearly a step in the right direction. However, affording an education is not the most crucial thing, but rather the recognizing [of] the value of the education. That's the message that needs to get across."

Candidates' differences emerge in first debate

By DANTE J. SCALA
News Editor

Like boxers in the ring, Vice President George Bush and Gov. Michael Dukakis shook hands before they came out fighting in their first debate Sept. 25 at Wake Forest University in North Carolina.

The two candidates' verbal thrusts and parries did not produce a winner, said Dr. Robert W. Langran, political science professor.

The debate did make it clear, however, that "what really divides the two are their issues," said Langran.

Indeed, the two disagreed sharply on a number of issues, including abortion, health care, the death penalty, the role of the federal government and military spending.

A panel of journalists, including ABC-TV anchorman Peter Jennings, questioned the candidates. The debate was controlled by rules agreed upon by both candidates. Questions ranged over a variety of domestic and foreign issues.

Drugs

Bush and a "deterioration of values" was a cause of America's current drug problem. In addition to improving education and being tougher on criminals, he added, "We have got to instill values in these young people." He mentioned a "many-point" drug program he would implement if elected.

Dukakis countered that while values are important, leaders have to reflect these values. He then referred, as he did at other times, to the United States' relationship with Panamanian leader Gen. Manuel Noriega, whom he called a "drug-running ... dictator." He also outlined a program of enforcement and education.

The federal deficit

Dukakis said his plan to cut the federal budget deficit includes eliminating certain unneeded weapons systems, investing in economic growth, bringing interest rates down and collecting unpaid taxes.

He then criticized Bush for wanting to spend "a great deal of money on just about every weapons system" and for wanting to give the wealthiest a tax break. "If he keeps this up he's, going to be the Joe Isuzu of American politics," said Dukakis, referring to the continually lying car salesman on an automobile commercial.

Bush countered, "Is this the time to unleash our one-liner? That answer was about as clear as [the polluted] Boston Harbor."

He continued that a cut in the capital gains tax would actually increase the government's tax revenues while creating more jobs. He mentioned his "flexible freeze" proposal for cutting the deficit and said he supported a balanced budget amendment. The problem is that government spends too much, said Bush.

Health insurance

Bush said he would "permit people to buy into Medicaid." He added that the catastrophic health insurance bill should be fully enforced. But he said an "across-the-board" mandate that all companies must provide health insurance would drive some companies out of business and hurt the economy. He also criticized the program's expense.

Dukakis countered that Bush had not provided an answer to the 37 million Americans who make too much money to qualify for Medicaid but cannot afford to buy health insurance. He said his state's recently passed universal health care bill has been supported by "virtually everybody" in Massachusetts. He added, "I think it's time that when you've got a job in this country, it came with health insurance."

Dukakis and the ACLU

Dukakis replied to a question about his "passionless, technocratic" way of governing, "I care deeply about people, all people, working people ..."

Bush said he did not question his opponent's passion, but added that Dukakis is "out of the mainstream." He mentioned that Dukakis is "a card-carrying member" of the American Civil Liberties Union [ACLU], as he has repeatedly done during the campaign. He also said that Dukakis described himself as a "strong liberal Democrat" in August 1987.

When asked if he had been trying to brand Dukakis as unpatriotic with the ACLU statement, Bush said he was not questioning Dukakis' patriotism, but was pointing out Dukakis' liberal views.

Dukakis responded, "Of course the Vice President is questioning my patriotism ... And I resent it." He added that he hoped "we get to the issues."

The homeless and housing

Dukakis supported a larger role for the federal government in dealing with the problems of housing and the homeless than Bush did.

Death penalty and abortion

Dukakis said he is against the death penalty but is "very tough on violent crime."

On abortion, Dukakis said, "I don't favor abortion ... The question is who makes the decision? And I think it has to be the woman in the exercise of her own conscience and religious beliefs that makes that decision."

Bush responded that he does support the death penalty, in part because "I do believe it would be inhibiting." He also mentioned the furlough program which was in place in Massachusetts while Dukakis was governor, which "furloughed murderers who had not served enough time to be eligible for parole."

Bush also said that he was for adoption and against abortion. In response to a follow-up question, Bush said he had not "sorted out the penalties" for abortion if a law banning abortion were reinstated.

Dukakis said, "I think what the Vice President is saying is that he's prepared to brand a woman a criminal for making this decision."

Bush decided after the debate that women who have abortions should not be criminally penalized, but doctors who perform them should be, according to his campaign chairman.

Bush said he wanted to give local and state governments as much control as possible. He also

Lewis fills cabinet seats

By SHEILA COURTER
Staff Reporter

Student Government President-elect John Lewis announced Monday he has filled eight of the seats in his future cabinet.

The positions currently filled are in the departments of external affairs, internal affairs and academic affairs. A treasurer and director of personnel have also been named.

The new secretary for the department of external affairs is Arline Kerrigan, a junior. Kerrigan has had previous experience with this department as assistant secretary. She also worked with the department of personnel.

Kerrigan spent the last two summers working with the Pentagon, and makes an effort to attend all Radnor Township meetings, said Lewis.

According to a pamphlet distributed by the Student Government titled "Villanova University Student Government," the department of external affairs deals with issues such as local and state government, voter registration, off-campus housing, parking and minority recruitment.

Assistant secretaries in this department are Alan Shuckrow and Michelle Bogosian, both sophomores. Both Shuckrow and Bogosian worked with the department last year and helped in developing many of the plans and proposals.

Bogosian is also a permanent resident in the town of Villanova, which could help to keep the department in touch with local happenings, Lewis said.

Michelle Ciccolo, a senior, will continue as secretary of internal affairs. Last year she worked with Sean Closkey's campaign for Student Government president.

Ciccolo also worked on Student Government's coeducational dormitory report.

The department of internal affairs deals with non-academic aspects at the University. It handles issues such as parking, meal polan, alcohol policy, campus life, housing, Greek life, residence hall conditions, tuition and student rights, as noted by the pamphlet.

The new secretary for the department of academic affairs is Laura Stevens, and the assistant secretary is Barbara Kresch. Both are sophomores and worked the department last year.

The department's main responsibility is to provide for the needs of the students. According to the pamphlet, their main issues are pre-registration, scheduling, advisement, course offering, teacher evaluation, academic calendar, rank and academic honesty.

The new director of personnel is senior Kate Wagenmann, who organized the used book sale which took place at the beginning of this semester. The director of personnel is in charge of the recruitment and organization of new members for Student Government.

All the appointees, except Davis, have worked previously within Student Government President Phil Brach's administration.

Lewis said he feels that the new cabinet is filled with young, but experienced people who know what they are doing.

The positions of vice president, secretary and assistant secretary for the department of public relations, and the assistant secretary in the department of internal affairs have yet to be announced.

The new president and his cabinet will begin their terms on Oct. 6.

Senate meets for first time

By MAUREEN STAPLETON
Staff Reporter

The University Senate briefly met for the first time during the academic year on Sept. 23.

Prior to the meeting, a wine and cheese party was held for the senators and administrators to socialize. The meeting itself was short because there was minimal business for the Senate to address.

A question was raised concerning the status of the executive secretary of the Senate. Student Senator Jonathan Zahm of University College was elected, the executive secretary but could not be officially recognized as such. This was due to the question of his eligibility to be a senator.

Both Zahm and student Senator Christopher Sperduto were transfer students elected to the Senate. According to the rules, both senators do not have enough credits to be juniors and thus are not official senators unless the Senate makes an exception or amends the Senate's constitution.

An exception was made for Zahm and Sperduto by the rules and review committee, but it must be reviewed by the executive committee before it is brought before the Senate. Zahm said that a constitutional amendment would take too long and that "an entire semester would be wasted" before both he and Sperduto would be officially recognized as senators.

Zahm said, however, that the student senators would work to make the constitutional change so that all sophomores can run for the Senate, including transfer students. He said, "It is of great importance to have a full compliment of senators."

Under new business, Phil Brach, Student Government president, publicly denounced the lecture scheduled for Nov. 13 by the controversial theologian Rev. Charles E. Curran, S.T.D., sponsored by the religious studies department. He said, "I don't feel he represents the Catholic identity that the University purports to be."

Also under new business, Dr. Harry R. Strack, political science professor, questioned Dr. Philip A. Maurone, chairman of the University Senate, about the status of the minus grading system. This system was passed in March 1987 by the Senate. The approval of the system by the Rev. John A. Driscoll, O.S.A., former University President, was announced last semester. The status of this issue will be made public at the next Senate meeting.

The meeting was the last for Brach as Student Government president. Zahm publically recognized the work of Brach.

New business chapter formed

By JENNIFER LUNDGREN
Staff Reporter

A chapter of the Society for the Advancement of Management [SAM] was established at the University on Sept. 22.

It is an additional organization for students from the College of Commerce and Finance to broaden their range of knowledge of the business world.

SAM is a national society with chapters on 160 campuses nationwide consisting of more than 5,000 members, said Dr. Donald Burke, chairman of the department of management. Currently, there are 19 members in Villanova's chapter.

SAM's main purpose as a professional society is to give students the chance to make contacts and to offer lectures about management issues, said Kate Wagenmann, chapter president.

In addition to lectures, this society will organize trips to see speakers and plans to attend a Philadelphia Senior Chapter meeting. Plans are also being discussed about attending this year's national conference in Cincinnati, said Wagenmann.

The group also plans to participate in a mock trial competition. Four members from each society are selected to compete. All groups arrive with a pre-assigned case which they present before a panel of judges, which then awards a prize to the best team.

There are no prerequisites needed to be a member of SAM. It is open to all College of Commerce and Finance students and there is an equal distribution of majors among the present members.

Wagenmann said that the induction of this chapter reflects the professional image of the College of Commerce and Finance and the serious attitude of the students here.

Dean Alvin A. Clay of the College of Commerce and Finance holds the society's charter with Kate Wagenmann, president and founder, while Dr. Donald R. Burke looks on.

Alvin A. Clay, dean of the College of Commerce and Finance, pointed out that Villanova is recognized as having a qualified management program with the addition of SAM.

National News Notes

College demography to change

Non-traditional students — those at least 25-years-old who often have families and jobs — will make up half of the nation's college population by the year 2000, a new report by the College Board said.

Those students, the board said, will need fewer services than students aged 18 to 25, but will bring as much revenue to colleges as younger students do.

The survey, conducted by the College Board's Office of Adult Learning Services [OALS], also found that more than six million adults study for college credit each year.

"We found that adults are serious students, and that they enroll in the mainstream of higher education," said OALS Director Carol B. Aslanian.

In addition, the survey found older students require fewer services.

Health clinics face abortion rule

Campus health clinics around the country may soon be unable to provide students with information about abortions, said the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services [HHS].

A new policy, supposedly effective since March but only recently invoked, will stop granting federal funds to clinics and hospitals that distribute abortion information to patients.

Federal funding reaches $400,000 a year for some clinics. The effect of the policy would be "devastating," said campus health officials.

Federal courts in Massachusetts and Colorado determined the policy violated the Family Planning Act in that it is contrary to medical ethics by withholding certain kinds of medical help from students.

Professor remains suspended

A Georgia Southwestern College [GSC] professor lost a Sept. 12 court fight to get back into a classroom from which he was barred for calling one of his students a "black -----."

U.S. District Judge Duross Fitzpatrick ruled that GSC President William Capitan could suspend professor Allen Towery without pay for fall term as punishment for making the remark in an argument with student Ginerva Dennis about her grade last March.

Fitzpatrick said Towery "showed a lack of discipline when he used a particularly egregious expression."

Capitan thought so last March when GSC suspended Towery with pay. In June, a faculty committee recommended that Towery be allowed to teach again in the fall, but Capitan overruled the committee, suspending the professor without pay for the term.

Last week's decision followed a hearing of Towery's arguments to overturn his suspension.

SEPTA to build new bridge

By JENNA WARD
Staff Reporter

Construction of a new footbridge crossing the Norristown High Speed Rail near Moriarty Hall began in early July and is scheduled to conclude this October, according to the Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority [SEPTA].

After reviewing inspection reports, SEPTA resolved last spring to replace the 50-year-old footbridge, according to SEPTA's service relations department.

According to the service relations department, the total cost of this program, which includes four new bridges over rail lines in Villanova, Park View, Haverford and Bryn Mawr, is estimated at $975,000. The cost of the Villanova bridge project itself is $235,000.

Paid through federal, local and state funds, SEPTA is now providing the funds in conjunction with the Urban Mass Public Transportation Authority.

The footbridge is used by south campus residents as well as SEPTA commuters. In order to prevent disturbances, SEPTA has made assurances that the old bridge will remain in service during construction, but upon the project's completion, it will be torn down.

Students register

By MAUREEN STAPLETON

Student Government will be running a voter registration drive until Oct. 8. The department of external affairs, under the direction of Arline Kerrigan, is conducting the drive.

The registration drive is for all students who wish to participate locally in the November election. Students who live in Delaware or Montgomery County can register to vote through the drive, said Kerrigan.

Student Government is also assisting those students who wish to change their legal residency to the Villanova area, she added.

The drive is being conducted at tables set up daily in Connelly Center from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Freshman problems persist

the Radnor Township manager, the chief of police and her attorneys to see what she could do to stop the problems that have occurred at Radnor House.

As a result, security has been "stepped up" to deter underage drinking and residents under 21 who attempt to bring alcoholic beverages into Radnor House will be denied entrance, she said.

Warnings are no longer given to residents who break Radnor House rules. Fines are handed out immediately, she added.

Nordell explained that the transition from high school to college is difficult enough for freshman without having to worry about living off campus and about other possible distractions. However, "I'm too young to be their mother. This is a condo, not a dorm," she said.

Some of the "antics" which have occurred include "ring and run" [ringing a resident's doorbell and then running away], stealing wreaths from tenants' doors and vomiting in the hallways and leaving it unattended, she said.

There has also been excessive noise, "unbelievable amounts of drinking" and parties which "float from room to room," she added.

Nordell explained that in most instances the problem is caused by a student or a guest. She added that Radnor House has not fined anyone except Villanova students.

She said she has also received complaints from tenants who say that "it's a wild bunch."

She said she hoped that upperclassman residents of Radnor House would "show them [freshman] the ropes," explaining that she is under an obligation to protect everyone who lives there.

She said she feels that Villanova is under an obligation to "round them [freshmen] up into an assembly," find out where they are living and how they are doing as off-campus residents.

She added that the problem is not exclusive to Radnor House. The whole township faces this problem, she said.

Stack said the Rev. Francis A. Farsaci, O.S.A., advisor for off-campus residents, and others spoke to off-campus freshmen during the Orientation Program about "expectations within the community, difficulties they might expect to encounter ... and personal adjustment.

"We basically laid everything out for them, but then threw it back at them, saying that we're not mind readers. They've got to come and make things known to us. With 6,000 people you don't just call them in one at a time and say, 'how's it going today?' As freshmen, that's not always easy to do [get them all together], but it was not that we didn't make the effort," Stack continued.

Mike Terzian, a junior and Radnor House resident, said that it would be a good idea to have Stack speak to the freshmen directly "just to let them know that they're not living in a dormitory ... They're living in an apartment [where] not everyone is a student, so you have to act more responsible than if you were living on campus."

Radnor House has been forced to change policies.

Terzian said he does not perceive the problem in Radnor House to be as severe as Nordell said. "The only problem we've had in our wings has been garbage. For me it's not an immediate problem, but maybe for other people in the building it's been worse," he said.

"I think it's definitely a responsibility of the upperclassmen to show the freshmen how to act because we know that she's [Nordell] not going to put up with it. Someone's going to be out of housing if it keeps up," he added.

"I want everyone to live comfortably and happily. I don't want anyone getting hurt. I hope that it evens out. It won't be good for anyone if there's a lot of animosity and tension," Nordell said.

Bush, Dukakis debate

mentioned his policies on education and aiding the police, citing his endorsement by a Boston police union. "Do not erode out of the system the thousand points of light," he said, referring to a number of non-governmental programs and organizations which help the poor. He also said he would support the Head Start program.

Dukakis said that Ronald Reagan's administration has cut and slashed programs for the inner cities and for education. He spoke of government investment in job training, welfare reform, child care and health care.

Foreign policy

Responding to a question concerning accusations of being weak on defense and inexperienced in foreign policy, Dukakis said that some of America's strongest leaders were governors, referring to the Roosevelts. He added that Bush has a long resume, but referred to the Iran-contra scandal and, once again, to Noriega.

Dukakis said later that financial decisions have to be made in regard to defense spending. He said he was for the Stealth defense plane and for the advanced cruise missile, and would continue research on the Strategic Defense Initiative system.

"We've got to move ahead with the strategic arms negotiation process, with the comprehensive test ban treaty and with negotiations leading to conventional force reduction in Europe, with deeper cuts in the Soviet side," he said.

He later added that he was for strength in nuclear deterrence and conventional forces. He added that national security and economic security are linked.

Dukakis also said that the United States can never make concessions to terrorists, and criticized Bush for the Iran-contra scandal.

During the foreign policy section of the debate, Bush said Dukakis had been for a nuclear freeze. He said that the recent arms control agreement had been reached through a strong American defense. He said he opposed some weapons systems but was not "going to give away a couple of aces in that very tough card game" of negotiating with the Soviet Union.

He also said he wants to ban chemical and biological weapons from the earth. Bush said that America should cautiously welcome the possible reformation of the Soviet Union by its leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

He added that conventional forces have never been more ready than they are currently. He also said he would fully research the Strategic Defense Initiative and would deploy it when it is ready.

Bush responded to Dukakis' charges by saying that the Reagan administration's entire foreign policy record should be examined. He said he would take all the blame for the Noriega and Iran-contra incidents, "if you give me half the credit for all the good things that have happened in world peace since Ronald Reagan and I took over from the [Jimmy] Carter administration." He referred earlier to the Soviet pullout of Afghanistan, the possible end of the Iran-Iraq war and the possibility of peace in Southwest Africa.

Vice presidents

Bush once again defended Sen. Dan Quayle, his running mate. He commended Quayle's youth and his knowledge in defense matters, and praised him for enduring the "very unfair pounding" he has suffered since accepting the running mate position.

Dukakis said he picked Sen. Lloyd Bentsen, with whom he differs on several issues, because he would be a strong and active vice president and that he could step into the office of the presidency and serve well.

Bush on education

McGuiness, Clodius and other education professionals note Bush offered public support for — and certainly no public resistance to — the Reagan administration's budgetary attacks on federal college funding.

But now the Vice President calls for maintaining work-study, the still-unproven income-contingent loans program and Pell Grants for low-income students.

For middle-class students, the Vice President, like his Democratic opponent, Gov. Michael Dukakis, proposes creating a College Savings Bond. The bond would be similar to U.S. Savings Bonds, except that interest earned would be tax-free if the bond is applied to college expenses.

Helping students pay for college should be "one of our highest priorities in the 1990s," Bush says.

"The only thing he's wedded to is the college savings bond plan," said Becky Timmons of the American Council on Education. "It's something we're interested in. It could be an important vehicle for the middle class. But Bush has not laid out concrete plans for the poor."

"He's ignoring a whole sector

Bond scheduled to speak

By SINEAD QUINN
Staff Reporter

Civil rights activist Julian Bond will be lecturing Monday about "Origins and Developments in the Civil Rights Movement in America" as part of "The 1960s: Politics and Culture," an Honors program course.

Bond will be the first in a series of speakers who will focus on the moral, social and political revolution of the 1960s.

The lecture, which is sponsored by Bob Pigeon, history professor, and the history department, will be held on Oct. 3, at 8 p.m. in Bartley Hall, Room 209, according to a flyer from the honors program.

Bond was a force in the civil rights movement in the early 1960s and 1970s and continues to be active today. He is noteworthy as the first black official elected to serve in a southern legislature in the 20th century.

During Bond's term as a member of the Georgia House of Representatives, he sparked controversy because of his outspoken criticism of the Vietnam War. Consequently, he was denied his seat in the house.

Demanding his right to freedom of speech, he took his case to the Supreme Court in 1966. He was allowed to return to his seat in the legislature the same year.

Bond has taken part in or has founded such groups as the Student's Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the Southern Poverty Law Center, the Community Appeal for Human Rights and the Voter Education Project. His activism tends to be more understated than one would expect for such a prominent civil rights activist, according to the book, Julian Bond: Black Rebel, by John Neary.

His method is somewhat less aggressive than most, and he is content to be a part of the Georgia legislature, which he has been a member of since 1975, according to Leary's book.

Possibly the reason why Bond has been such a powerful force in the civil rights movement is that he prefers to make a large impact on a small area than to attempt to make a small impact on a larger area, according to the book.

Lewis interview jurisdiction of University President the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A.

Under this limitation, Lewis said that one of the possible goals of his term will be to amplify the voice of the Senate within the University.

Another goal of the Lewis administration will be the issue of tailgating.

Lewis added that the problem of drinking liability has not stopped. Those of legal drinking age continue to get their own alcohol, and since they are on University property, the school is still liable, said Lewis.

One of the options which Lewis offered is the initiation of highly supervised events, where the University would obtain a one-day liquor license and regulate alcohol distribution to those over 21.

Under this guideline students and alumni would not be permitted to bring their own alcohol, and therefore the University could regulate the consumption of the beverages.

The issue of coeducational residence halls is also high on the agenda for this year, said Lewis. He said he plans to continue the push for their implementation into the University.

Student group to register voters

By ELLIOT A. FUS
Staff Reporter

A new student organization forming on campus plans to encourage student voters to register in Radnor Township.

Its goal is to nominate members of the Villanova community for positions on the Radnor Township Board of Commissioners and to register University voters to back these candidates, said student Andy Laperriere, the initiator of the organization.

In response to housing laws and other restrictions, this group aims to motivate students to take an autonomous role in their local government.

In contrast to other student political organizations, Laperriere said that this group "will attain power instead of pleading to the powerful."

In 1985, Clinton A. Stuntebek, commissioner of the township's second ward [Villanova's Main campus], won his seat unopposed with 175 primary votes and 349 votes in the general election.

The untapped voting potential of a few major residence halls alone could generate a sizable opposition, said Laperriere.

To attract members to the organization, Laperriere will speak to a variety of audiences in and around campus. A primary meeting is scheduled for Tuesday at 4 p.m. in the East Lounge of Dougherty Hall. He is also planning to speak to alumni groups, the Interfraternity Council, the Villanova Student Union and other groups.

The first priority is to write a constitution and submit it for University sanction, said Laperriere. The group will then attempt to gain sufficient student involvement in time to challenge the three ward chairs open for 1989, said Laperriere.

In the future, the organization hopes to branch out and gain pro-Villanova leverage in other surrounding townships containing off-campus residents, Laperriere added.

Parents to visit for weekend

For those interested in dancing, a band playing songs of the '50s, '60s and '70s will be located in the Villanova Room. Bars will be set up and food provided in all three areas.

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, will attend to greet and to get to know parents, Gorski said.

There are a number of presentations starting at 10 a.m. tomorrow. The academic departments will host discussions in various locations across campus. At least 100 people are expected to attend the College of Nursing lecture and several hundred are expected to be at each of the other four academic colleges' programs, Gorski said.

Forums will also be presented by the international studies program, the Honors program and the physics department. A talk concerning parental help in student career choices will be held in the West Lounge of Dougherty Hall, said Gorski.

These academic programs will be scheduled during the time that former tailgating picnics were held in front of Sheehan Hall. Gorski said she does not "think it [Parents' Weekend] will be much different without tailgating. We've had years when there was no tailgating.

"We started adding events to the Parents' Weekend schedule even when there was tailgating and they've been well attended. Actually, we've had many negative comments about tailgating through the evaluation form in the Parents' Connection newsletter we sent out," Gorski said.

"Many parents were discouraged and disgusted with tailgating. Quite a few commented on the fact that although the drinking age is 21, there seemed to be many underage drinkers. Not everyone was negative, but there were quite a few complaints," she added.

The concert tomorrow night will be held in duPont Pavilion. The Four Tops and The Spinners, two popular Motown groups of the '60s and '70s, will perform. Tickets are still available for this concert.

Two brunches will be held on Sunday. Both seatings for the champagne brunch are sold out. The standard Sunday brunch will be available in the dining halls for $8 per person, said Gorski.

As there will be no tailgating picnics this year, the University has arranged for free lunch for parents tomorrow afternoon. Students are encouraged to eat at their usual dining halls, said Gorski.

The closing Mass will be held at 12:30 p.m. on Sunday in duPont Pavilion. It is expected to be widely attended, especially by freshmen and their parents, said Gorski.

Gorski said, "As a student grows older, there is less participation in the on-campus events. Parents have reported that they best enjoy meeting their sons' and daughters' friends. Parents [of upperclassmen] focus more on getting to know their children's friends and their parents."

At Villanova, date rape incidents recounted

Women do not report acquaintance/date rape or consider it a crime perhaps due to the fact they have invited the rapist into their home or accepted the date, said Melanie Sallie, community education and training director at the Philadelphia office of Women Organized Against Rape [WOAR].

Only 5 percent of rape victims involved in a poll conducted by Ms. magazine reported their rapes to the police, according to a Sept. 4 article in the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Stack explained that what the University does not have statistics on "is this very problem" of date rape.

Is date rape common only to college campuses? Not according to Marie Schauder, assistant director for training and development for Residence Life, who said that the problem of date rape is "not any different on college campuses than anywhere else."

When asked if date rape was a problem at Villanova, Schauder estimated, "no more than any other campus."

"The number of students on college campuses who suffer the trauma of sexual assault each year is staggering. These crimes have a major impact on the campus community, as well as on the students who are victimized," according to a report titled, "Sexual Assault On Campus: What Colleges Can Do," published by the Rape Treatment Center of Santa Monica Hospital Medical Center in Santa Monica, Calif.

Villanova is one of the few colleges where women of 18 and older are still referred to as "girls."

Most rapes on college campuses are date rapes, according to Sallie. The Inquirer cites that 70 to 80 percent of all rapes are acquaintance rapes.

Dr. Greg Nicholls, staff psychologist in Counseling and Career Services at St. Joseph's University in Philadelphia, said, "I'm sure [date rape] is a problem here," but he had no statistics on the problem.

Dr. Joan Greenhouse-Whitney, director of the Villanova University Counseling Center, was unavailable for comment due to a scheduling conflict and said she was "reluctant" to reschedule.

In April 1986, a Lehigh University freshman, Jeanne Clery, was raped and murdered in her dormitory room by another student. The highly publicized case resulted in the Pennsylvania state legislature passing a new law that all colleges and universities must record and make available to the public crime statistics, including rape on campus. This law was initiated by Clery's parents, according to media relations at Lehigh University.

"However, those numbers [statistics] will not reflect the vast majority of campus rapes that nearly always go unreported," explained the Inquirer article.

A Sept. 18 Inquirer article cited several incidents of date rape involving fraternities at various colleges across the country. At San Diego State University, a freshman woman was given spiked drinks, passed out and was raped by 11 men. The fraternity was expelled from the campus for 10 years, but it continued to operate off campus, and a party was held to celebrate the first anniversary of the rape.

A nude woman was handcuffed to a staircase during a "Pimp and Whore" party at Phi Sigma Kappa at Eastern Illinois University in Charleston, Ill., and a 19-year-old woman student was gang-raped during a party at Theta Delta Chi fraternity at the University of Rochester, the Inquirer reported.

These situations reflect the factors which contribute to date rape, especially use of alcohol and learned sexual attitudes.

"Eighty-five percent of date rapes are the result of alcohol abuse," said Jan Janosik, director of the Center for Drug and Alcohol Abuse.

Date rape is a serious problem on college campuses, she said. It is oftentimes the result of people overstepping their limits, especially with alcohol and marijuana.

Scene three: Kristin, a sophomore, met Dan at a small party at Sullivan Hall in a friend's room. Only a few people were drinking, and no one was drunk. Kristin had recently broken up with her boyfriend and she hadn't been feeling very good about herself. She talked with Dan for a long while and she found him to be a very nice, friendly person. Dan walked Kristin home to her room in Sheehan Hall after the party. Kristin had been drinking at the party, but she said she wasn't drunk until she got into her room, when intoxication "hit her all at once."

She described the following events as though she "were in a movie and she was watching herself in slow, dazed motion." Before she knew it, all of her clothes had been removed, and Dan, also naked, lay on top of her. "Are you drunk enough yet?" he asked. His comment spurred her back into consciousness and she became visibly upset. She tried quickly to get up, and she told him to leave immediately.

Petrified and physically shaking, Kristin sought comfort from her friend from Sullivan Hall, who was sympathetic but said, "You shouldn't have gone home with him."

Scene four: Three or four months later, the same female student, Kristin, was pledging a sorority, and all the sisters were at a party sponsored by a Villanova fraternity. Kristin was approached by a man, Steve [who was not a brother], whom she recognized as a member of the Blue Key Society and who had given her and her parents a tour of the school when she was a senior in high school. "He seemed like a very nice guy," Kristin said.

Kristin was drinking at the party, and soon she became very drunk. The police raided the party, and she panicked because she was underage. Steve offered to drive her home, and she was very grateful to get away from the raid and from possibly being arrested. Steve drove to his apartment in Sugartown, and invited Kristin up to his apartment. "I was very drunk, and he seemed like a guy I could trust. And I told him I wasn't going to have sex with him, and he agreed," she explained.

Kristin found Steve attractive and she thought she liked him, but she told him again she would not sleep with him. Steve became more and more persistent, and he tried to force her to have intercourse. "I felt him come down hard on me three or four times, and I got really scared," she said. She then had to struggle fiercely and physically pull him off her. Steve kept saying, "Yes, come on" while Kristin insisted "no," and he pushed her against the wall. "I thought you told me we would hang out together. I thought you'd make it worthwile," Steve told her.

Steve had passed out, unable to drive her home. She was very drunk also, and she soon passed out, too. Kristin woke up the next morning, naked, and felt "cheap, dirty and very scared," she said.

The Inquirer describes the kind of language most men have used at one time or another in reference to women. "I hope I score tonight ... I really put it to her ... She wouldn't give me any ... She was the best piece of a-- I ever had."

Villanova is one of the few colleges where women of 18 and older are still referred to as "girls," said Dr. Barbara Wall, O.P., philosophy professor.

A letter in the Vacuum, Villanova's underground newspaper, in response to an article the Vacuum published last year on date rape, noted, "Lately around campus, the mode of punishment for a woman who has committed the crime of disagreeing with a male is public humiliation in the form of a menacing 'F--- you b----,' screamed as loudly and in front of as many people as posible. Male spectators frequently add, 'Yeah, you tell her' or 'Oooo' or 'heh heh heh' for emphasis."

At San Diego State University, a freshman woman was given spiked drinks, passed out and was raped by 11 men. The fraternity was expelled from the campus for 10 years. . .a party was held to celebrate the first anniversary of the rape.

A letter to the editor in the Sept. 16 issue of the Villanovan, in reference to a Pi Kappa Phi Fraternity rush poster portraying a female gymnast with spread legs, said, "This blatant sexist comment insinuates to incoming freshmen that fraternities who use women as sexual objects are 'cool' ... I feel that subtle messages like [this] foster the seeds of date rape and sexual harassment."

One male Villanova student said in response to last week's article on date rape, "Women should know better than to get a man all heated up and then decide they don't want to have sex."

Stack said, "A lot of guys have the attitude they'll get what they can take."

Schauder divided the process of date rape into four steps: violation of a woman's personal space; the woman's failure to assert this is an invasion ["though the woman is never responsible for the rape"]; the couple usually ending up in a secluded, vulnerable place; the rape occurring.

"It is crucial for colleges to determine how they can most effectively impart information about sexual assaults to students. It is not sufficient to develop policies, brochures, and other informational materials if these items are not distributed in a way that emphasizes their importance and provokes the interest of students," the Santa Monica report commented.

"Information about sexual assaults should be imparted in person, i.e., in the classroom and during student orientation, and also through written communications that are sent directly to students, such as in a personal letter addressed to each student from the college president," the report recommended.

Schauder is in charge of a recently developed program that seeks to educate students of both sexes as to the facts of date rape. The program addresses the attitudes underlying the problem, the ways to help a friend and the local resources available to the victim, which include the University Counseling Center and WOAR.

The first program for the resident assistants on the topic was held Sept. 26, Schauder said. Though her staff, comprised of both men and women, has held programs in the past for women and is looking to develop a program for men, Schauder said the "best program is for mixed groups."

The program begins with a tape of different scenes for discussion purposes. The group discusses feelings, stereotypes and communication gaps. Schauder said an interesting note is that many of the women have some of the same stereotypes as men. The group makes use of a dialogue to sort out the stereotypes.

"It is important for the woman to realize it is not her fault she has been raped. She must talk to a professional because these feelings do not go away — they only manifest themselves," Janosik said.

Although Villanova does not have a women's center to deal with problems like date rape as some schools, such as the University of Pennsylvania, have, Schauder said students can make use of the University Counseling Center and other outside resources.

"Women should know better than to get a man all heated up and then decide they don't want to have sex."

Stack said, "I think there are people who do end up there [the University's Counseling Center] to seek help ... I don't know how many more go than don't. Most people think they can handle this ... people it happens to do not think they have been raped."

Colleges urged to help victims

Press Release

College presidents are urged, in a report released by the Rape Treatment Center of Santa Monica, Calif., to take immediate action to reduce the incidence of sexual assaults on campus and to protect the rights of student victims.

The report cites many cases of campus rape in which victims have been revictimized by their colleges and recommends major new policies and programs to remedy this problem.

Rape Treatment Center director and report co-author Gail Abarbanel states, "We're facing an epidemic. A recent national survey found that one in every six college women had been a victim of rape or attempted rape during the preceding year."

Adds Abarbanel, "In our experience treating victims from dozens of college campuses around the country, we have seen that most colleges are unprepared to deal with this crisis."

The report, entitled "Sexual Assault on Campus: What Colleges Can Do," cites common complaints of campus rape victims, including having to live in the same dormitory as the assailant following the rape; unsafe university housing vulnerable to break-ins by strangers; the absence of any rights or protections for the victim if she reports the assault and pursues a campus investigation; and failure by colleges and disciplinary action against offenders.

One case described in the report occurred at a large, private college in the South, where an assailant kicked in a flimsy, locked door leading to a female students room and sexually assaulted her as she was taking a shower. It was later determined that the lighting, doors, and locks in the college's housing units were inadequate and facilitated break-ins.

Aileen Adams, Rape Treatment Center legal counsel and report co-author cautions college administrators, "Colleges that do not provide a safe environment for students run a high risk of expensive lawsuits."

The report calls upon colleges to:

Adopt and send to every student an official policy that condemns rape and sexual assault.

Revise student conduct codes to specifically prohibit sexual assaults and provide certain rights for victims.

Establish procedures to modify living arrangements when the victim and the accused live in the same housing.

Institute mandatory, campus-wide educational programs on sexual assault for students, faculty and staff.

Provide support services for victims, including immediate medical treatment and counseling, and develop procedures for how college personnel should respond to victim reports.

Abarbanel added, "The consequences of not implementing widespread changes are potentially enormous. Without new policies and programs, victims will not come forward to receive the help they need to recover from their trauma; most assailants will not be brought to justice; and campus rape will continue to escalate.

Students awarded

University Press Release

Four Villanova University students were awarded Charlotte W. Newcombe Foundation Scholarships for Mature Women, intended to financially aid second-career women 25 years or older.

Three recipients are enrolled in University College and the other is a full-time student enrolled in the College of Engineering.

They are Eileen McCaffery, of Havertown, a sociology major with a 4.0 average; Amy Milavsky, of Voorhees, N.J., an English major with a 4.0 average; Patricia Pease, of Bala Cynwyd, a communication arts major with a 3.4 average; and Marianne Zygmont, of Wayne, an electrical engineering major with a 3.9 average.

The University was granted $7,000 in scholarship funds from the Princeton, N.J.-based foundation, which awarded grants to several area colleges and universities.

The foundation was established under the will of Charlotte W. Newcombe, who died in 1979. Although poor eyesight prevented her from attending college, she placed high value on university education. She sent many of her friends' children to college and took keen interest in their progress. She established the foundation to continue her scholarship gifts.

The four Villanova scholarships are administered by University College, which offers classes on weekdays, evenings and Saturdays for individuals pursuing their undergraduate degrees or seeking personal enrichment.

Throughout the year, University College offers non-credit Continuing Education programs in paralegal education, business management and business skills for liberal arts graduates. Courses for credit are offered in business, arts, sciences and computer science.

Education

of the population," Janet Lieberman of the United States Student Association said.

The Vice President, a Yale graduate, does have a long record of supporting black colleges. Many black college presidents credit Bush with helping their institutions secure federal grants.

Bush, too, has been a long-time supporter of the United Negro College Fund, donating half the royalties he receives from his autobiography "Looking Forward" to the fund.

While a Texas congressman from 1967 to 1970, Bush did vote for the major education funding bills that arose.

Education, in fact, is one arena where Bush appears eager to distance himself from the Reagan administration, but many campus denizens, unrepentedly resentful of Reagan, wonder where he was when they needed him.

"The question is, where has he been for the last eight years?" asked Michael Edwards of the National Education Association.

But Terrel Bell, President Reagan's first Education secretary, noting vice presidents are supposed to play subservient roles, didn't "think it's fair to say the Vice President should be responsible for the President's policies."

Dobbin inauguration

Temple University, are also expected to take part in the convocation.

One hundred and sixty visiting representatives from other institutions and schools from across the country will also be parading in academic garb, Fitzpatrick said. Guests from various learned societies and professional associations will also be part of the procession.

Other guests include Dobbin's family, friends and colleagues. Most of the members of the Board of Trustees, benefactors and friends of Villanova and some Radnor Township commissioners are expected to attend as well.

Fitzpatrick said that nearly every part of the University has been involved in the planning of the event. "Students and all employees, regardless of what their employment position here, would be part of the celebration, as well as part of the planning," she said.

Ellis said that all current students were sent invitations to the inauguration and to a reception afterward.

"A lot of attention has been given to student involvement. It's not just the University or the trustees or the faculty or even Fr. Dobbin's event. It's really for the fact that students are essential to the mission of this school. We want the students to feel it's their event as well," Fitzpatrick said.

Classes have been cancelled on the day of the inauguration and "employee work schedules have been relaxed so that all members of the campus community can participate in the historic events," according to a University press release.

The day will begin with a Mass at 10 a.m. in the Main Chapel. Key student leaders, faculty and Dobbin's family are involved in the Mass.

The press release stated that Dobbin will be concelebrating the Mass with past Villanova presidents the Rev. Francis McGuire, O.S.A., the Rev. J. Welsh, O.S.A., the Rev. Edward J. McCarthy, O.S.A., and the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A.

The formal installation of Dobbin will take place at 3 p.m. in the duPont Pavilion. The event includes music provided by the University's band, the Villanova Singers, the Glee Club and gospel singers, Fitzpatrick said.

Dobbin will give an inaugural address during the ceremony at the pavilion. He is expected to outline his vision for Villanova, Fitzpatrick added.

According to Ellis and Fitzpatrick, a special Villanova medallion was commissioned for this event. The medal is made of semi-precious metals, silver and enamel on the large chain and bears the Villanova seal. It will be used by the president at functions and will serve to symbolically represent the University.

Vicki Huber: Gold in our eyes

She's tough, talented and seemingly tireless. She's Vicki Huber — Villanova's first female Olympian and we are proud.

Senior Vicki Huber placed sixth in the women's 3000-meter race of the 1988 Summer Olympic Games last week. She was the first American to cross the finish line as she outran U.S. favorite Mary Slaney.

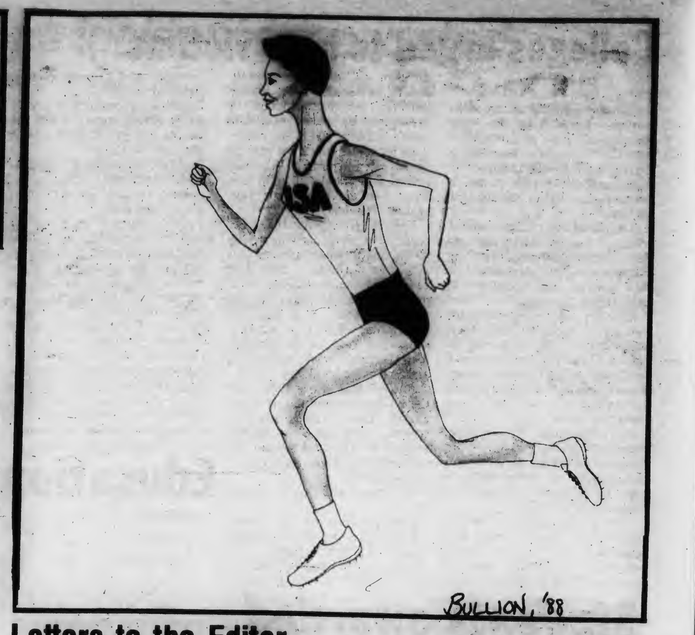
Huber currently holds American Collegiate records in the 3000 meter, 1500 meter and the mile. She was recently named a Jumbo Elliott Award Recipient, an award which recognizes the nation's top collegiate track and field athletes.

The five-foot six-inch, 110-pound star was the first woman to win both the NCAA indoor mile and 3000-meter championships — and in less than an hour between the races.

A psychology/pre-med major at Villanova, Huber is a member of the GTE/CoSIDA Academic all-America first team in 1988 with a 3.52 grade point average.

There's no doubt about it. Huber is an outstanding student-athlete and has made us all proud. She may not have won a medal in Seoul, Korea, but she has certainly won our hearts and respect at Villanova.

Congratulations Vicki Huber. You are our gold.



Date rape: A college reality

Acquaintance rape is a sad reality on today's college campuses. Women must begin to protect themselves immediately to avoid firsthand experiences. Men must realize the criminal consequences of date rape and conduct themselves accordingly.

Many people do not realize that acquaintance rape is a very serious crime. It is treated as any other rape case — with harsh ramifications and penalties. However, most acquaintance rapes are not reported and offenders are never apprehended.

Society's attitudes must change in order to reduce the number of acquaintance rapes. Men and women must be more aware of their dating situations. Men must stop seeing women as sexual objects and women must stop pretending they are.

In addition, men and women must remain in control of their faculties at all times. Being drunk is not an acceptable excuse for forcing unwanted sex. Being drunk is also not an acceptable reason for consenting to have sex that would have been denied if sober.

Acquaintance rape is happening everyday and Villanova is not immune to it. We must wake up and take charge of our dating relationships.

Be aware of acquaintance rape and its serious ramifications. Avoid dangerous situations. Protect yourself from becoming yet another statistic.

Defending UCO's mission

To the Editor:

I am not Catholic and certainly not associated with University Christian Outreach (UCO). Yet Mr. Pucci's editorial about them intrigues me. Reading between the lines, I wonder about some of the facts underlying the strong language of the oped.

Evidently, one of UCO's main faults is friendliness. Maybe it is wrong that a group which claims to follow Jesus should be friendly to strangers. Of course, the oped suggests that this friendship is a fake. This is possible; but then the article mentions that many graduates return to the meetings. Why would a person spend years in a group which has no real friendships?

But maybe the old member is attracted by the "intense elements" of UCO meetings, for instance, speaking in tongues. (We should ignore the fact that St. Paul claimed to speak in tongues more than anyone; we could hardly think that a Villanovan would wish to associate with religious fantatics like St. Paul and UCO.)

Perhaps the most telling fault of UCO consists in their desire to initiate debate on the "truth about God." Perhaps the faculty should be dismayed when students spend evenings in lively debate on moral and spiritual issues, instead of dutifully memorizing and applying formulas to textbook problems.

The article also describes UCO beliefs as "fundamentalism." What is meant by this? The principal definition of fundamentalism according to Webster's is "orthodox religious beliefs based on a literal interpretation of the Bible."

Is this contrary to Catholic principles? Or perhaps the term is meant in the sense of moral restrictiveness. Perhaps UCO does not condone behaviors such as fake IDs or premarital sex.

Probably the author means the sense of certainty that UCO members have. (Would Jesus discourage such wholehearted devotion to "truth about God?") The oped suspects that UCO wants to attract and change the beliefs of "not particularly devout Catholics." Should we commend or condemn UCO for this?

It is possible that Pucci's article has some valid points, for instance, I have never read any of UCO's allegedly "manipulative masterpieces." But certainly I cannot see why the oped insinuates that a campus group should not try to be friendly.

More importantly, why should a group's sincere belief in "truth about God" be described as "putting on an act to manipulate?"

The oped accuses UCO of manipulation, (because they are friendly and talk about religion!) but gives me few facts to verify this. Perhaps new students should consider "rather personal issues" in college, and should not avoid groups which deal with "touchy" topics.

Security must provide safety

By MAUREEN STAPLETON

Welcome to Villanova, parents! I am sure that by the time you leave here on Sunday the impression you will have of Villanova will only be a good one.

As parents, you will carry images of a safe Villanova campus for your son or daughter. But is it?

Students have been clamoring for some time that the Security at Villanova is quite lax. In fact, last year, the University Senate began a committee to study the work of the Villanova Security Department. Unfortunately, this committee's work slowed down once the Program Evaluation Committee began to also study Security.

The committee made a number of recommendations, but the only tangible evidence of change that I can see is some doors of the residence halls have been changed into "exit only" doors.'

Concern over campus security is not one that is unique to Villanova. Let me tell you a story of a young woman at Lehigh University whose name was Jeanne Clery.

Two and a half years ago, this 19-year-old freshman was awakened while her room was being robbed by a fellow student. Fearing that she would turn him in, the robber proceeded to beat, rape and murder Clery.

The authorities were eventually able to identify the killer through the teeth marks he left on her. The killer had returned to the scene of the crime upon the realization that he had left his wallet. He bit Clery to assure himself that she was actually dead.

Clery's parents, Howard and Connie Clery of Bryn Mawr, are now heading a campaign for all colleges to release all information concerning campus security to students, employees and prospective students. Colleges must release this information by Nov. 26.

In a recent article in The Main Line Times, Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, said that he would release the information in November to all who "request" it.

Personally, I think the information should be released to everyone who is in touch with the University, including parents, student, employees and prospective students.

If Security is as good as they say, what do they have to be afraid of by releasing this information?

Neville also states in the article, "We've always been concerned about Security." You could have fooled me. Or at least, they have been concerned about it, but any actual change for the better is hard to find.

Last year, a man was found to be roaming the halls of Good Counsel and letting himself into girls' rooms and sitting on their beds. The dorm was swamped with Security personnel that night, but the next day none could be found anywhere.

Just last week, a man was found in the showers of St. Rita's Hall, and Radnor Township police had to be called to accost the individual. How was this strange man able to gain access to the shower in the first place?

Every morning I leave for crew practice at 4:50 a.m. Would you believe that while I am roaming the halls and consequently walking to duPont Pavilion I hardly ever pass a security officer?

I would at least expect an officer to be in the dorm considering the fact that breaking a window to obtain access into the building would be easy to do and most people sleep with their doors unlocked.

How easy would it be for someone to repeat the same act of violence that occurred to Jeanne Clery?

Athletic Department refuses to support gymnast

By KERRY STROMBERG

"At Villanova we demonstrate a caring, personal interest from the moment you begin your investigation into the University until long after your graduation." (Villanova Admissions Booklet, page 14.) Coming to Villanova as a freshman last year, this was the philosophy I had expected to find. I was proven wrong.

My name is Kerry "the hula-hoop girl" Stromberg, and I am a rhythmic gymnast. First of all, I would just like to say that I am not writing this as an ego boost or for sympathy, I am just going to state the facts so that all of you may decide for yourselves whether, "the individual is important." (Page 14.)

Villanova is looking for students who "have a wide variety of interests." (Page 14.) I would like to add to that, "... as long as the University does not have to extend itself in any way." In this sense I am sure my achievements in the sport were definitely a factor in my acceptance, yet their concern in my unique interest ended there with my resume.

I wanted to compete and did not feel it would be difficult as long as I had a place to practice, so I spoke to the Athletic Director, Theodore A. Aceto, about the possibility of forming a rhythmic gymnastics team. He replied, "No, we want quality teams, not a quantity of teams at Villanova."

I would just like to ask Aceto of how much more quality does he want than being ranked second in Connecticut at the highest level, and being accepted to the Olympic Training Center in Colorado both in 1986 and 1988?

I then tried to get a sponsorship by the University, and compete under the name of Villanova. I went to Promotions and Management with a list of my meet expenses totaling $765.

I was told that the University did not have the money, and the Athletic Department could not afford to sponsor me. I still do not know how he could say that with a straight face. Furthermore, I thought the athletic director was supposed to be concerned about all sports and the development of athletics at Villanova.

I am obviously wrong considering various situations, the indifference to the problems of the club sports, and the dropping of the wrestling program (which was a quality sport). Therefore, it seems that the Villanova athletic director's job is to pick a few "special" sports, and to cater to their every need while brushing the other sports aside. Enough said.

During my season new complications arose where the University again showed their lack of concern. I became injured and asked to see a trainer. I was not allowed because I was not a Villanova "athlete," nor could I use ATRA for the same reason.

Then the most troubling of problems arose. Due to my extensive traveling for meets, many times I was unable to return in time for my Monday classes, and hence jeopardized my grade due to the Freshman Attendance Policy.

I went to the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., Dean of Students, and asked if I could go under Villanova's name only so I would be considered an "athlete," and therefore be exempt from the attendance policy.

I wanted no monetary help or any other aid, I just did not want to fail three of my classes. I explained that I was a Dean's List student, and that my grades were not a problem, yet he said he could not help me, and told me to see Helen K. Lafferty, assistant dean for Arts. Stack must have been the wrong person to talk to, because each time I did, he always told me to go speak with someone else.

Lafferty said she could not do anything since the Athletic Department would not recognize me as an athlete — even in name.

The ironic part is that if I went to the Olympics, I am sure Villanova would use my name to promote the school, even if I was not a Villanova "athlete."

So I was told to speak with my teachers, and unfortunately, one teacher said that she followed University policy, and if I missed more than five classes, I would fail. What did I do? Strangely enough I was "sick" many of the days I had meets.

So there you have it. Is the individual really important? You decide.

Despite the many problems, I would like to thank a few people for their help: the Rev. William McGuire, O.S.A., for his cooperation with scheduling gym space, Prof. Jeffrey Hahn of the political science department, for unselfishly trying to convince Aceto to change his decision, and for my family and friends for their support throughout the year.

Depression: A collegiate reality

By G.J. DONNELLY

To describe a condition such as depression, the first thing one must concede is that it is a very difficult task. Depression is really a feeling within oneself that cannot be accurately articulated in words. That, at least, is the way it seems to me.

I suffer from depression.

Not too long ago I sat with a friend and talked about what it means to be depressed. He kept telling me that I was young and had no problems as far as he could see. It was rather difficult and frustrating for me to explain it to him and in the end it only seemed to confuse him more.

I realized afterward that depression is something that is often misunderstood by those around the person suffering. The feelings of intense fear and loneliness surround everyone. The experience of lying in bed unable to sleep due to the anger and pain that causes the tears to come.

What causes this?

I cannot really tell you that there is a single cause for every depression. In my case it was a feeling of inadequacy due to unhappiness at home and frustration at school. Not original causes, I grant you, but no less self-destructive either.

I began to wake up in the morning to see a face in the mirror I detested. I could not accept myself and my flaws. Instead I resorted to desperate actions to gain attention and acceptance which only resulted in making people I cared about at best uncomfortable.

Why didn't I talk to someone about this then?

Two words ... my pride.

The reason why it is so difficult to talk about an emotional problem such as this is that in admitting it you are, in effect, admitting a weakness in yourself that others do not seem to have.

My pride, however useful in hiding my insecurity, proved to be a double edged-sword. In refusing to get help for myself, I allowed the pain inside to build up to a point where it became impossible to cope.

Last November I tried to commit suicide, and six months later came dangerously close to trying again.

The individual circumstances of these incidents are not important, the ramifications are. After confessing to a close friend about what I had done and how I felt, she and her boyfriend dragged me (kicking and screaming I might add) to the counseling center.

Eventually I began to see a psychiatrist who informed me that this was not an uncommon problem. I began to take medication to correct the chemical imbalance in my bloodstream and I began to regain confidence in myself.

The point of this essay is not to arouse pity for myself or those who suffer from depression. Acceptance must come from within not from others. I am merely trying to state that there is a lot of pressure in a college as academically and socially competitive as Villanova. The stress of this pressure is often too much to bear and too humiliating to admit.

Even now, despite the treatment I receive, I often feel isolated and have low self-esteem. I am trying to do something about that and I feel that I am beginning to crawl out of the hole I was in.

The only thing I really want to say is that the pressure of school and life overcame me as it could anyone. I am not proud of that fact, but my stupidity in refusing to accept it nearly destroyed me.

I want to show others who may be having a rough go of it that there is hope and you are not alone. If I am crazy enough to admit my story in public, it should not be all that difficult to admit a problem of yours in a confidential session with a counselor.

On the other hand, if you read this and say to yourself, "It doesn't happen here" or "It doesn't affect me" you are wrong. Dead wrong.

Behavior intolerable

To the Editor:

The Falvey Memorial Library is being run a little differently this academic year; you are sure to notice it in the absence of a Villanova ID card.

A frequent occurrence is a student being turned away from the turnstile because he or she has forgotten an ID card. It does not matter that the student has a room key, meal card and Villanova boxer shorts, he or she can not come in to study or do research.

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, endeavors to create an academic "powerhouse;" an idea that seems inconsistent with the policy of refusing entrance to a library (which it would seem is the pillar of a liberal arts education.)

When I read the motto "Tolle Lege, Tolle Lege" on the wall of the library's foyer, I do not expect to be barred from my desire to "Take up and read!" Yet this happens time and time again at the doors of Falvey.

The preceding paragraph has set the stage for my true complaint that arises from the behavior of one Security Officer, a Mr. Bucharel, who was at the library the night of Sept. 20. I was one of the many students who witnessed this officer publicly berate a female student after she had inquired as to the officer's justification for not letting her friend into the library even though she had a meal card, a room key, and an out of state driver's license (I heard another student remark that night that he did not drive from New York to sneak into Falvey.)

Officer Bucharel engaged the student's question with a barrage of verbal abuse, at quite a loud volume, even though he had threatened earlier to "write up" students for speaking amongst themselves.

With the attention of many would-be studiers upon him, the officer preceded to title the woman "babe" and to continue on in a degrading and rude manner.

This year has seen an increase in the awareness of sexism and sexist attitudes, subtle and conspicuous, and there is evidence of this problem thriving at Villanova as well as in the larger society.

If Bryn Mawr College allows visitors to sign a guest list at their library, why can't Villanova? If Villanova values the Mission Statement as much as it professes, why is it employing a man such as Bucharel?

I quote, "The University seeks to employ on all levels those who are sympathetic to and supportive of its character and identity. According, Villanova confidently expects that all students, faculty, administration, and staff will so comport themselves as to assure the continuance and enhancement of the University's high purposes and its moral and religious traditions."

I guess what shocked me the most was the fact that every person I spoke with when I registered my complaint with Security had the same reaction, "Oh! Bucharel again! He is always doing stuff like this," or "Well, he is always loud like that."

I also asked Security if I could see Bucharel's records so I could judge if this was a common occurrence, needless to say, as a student I am not privy to such information.

UCO defends message

To the Editor:

Last week a student misrepresented the Villanova chapter of University Christian Outreach. It seems to me unnecessary to defend or explain ourselves in the final analysis. I believe most students who wish to form an opinion would not base it on a letter like the one printed, but are secure enough to come and see, ask a question or attend a meeting.

What concerns me most are the broader issues the letter raises, like, "Should a Christian evengelize?" The desire to share one's faith is as fundamental to Christianity as prayer. It was the command of Jesus to His disciples, and it is the primary mission of the Church. Christians are always searching for new and more effective ways to introduce others to the saving power of the Gospel and to grow in their faith.

Students who take the risk and sacrifice the time because they want to share their faith with others do so because they want to share with others what they have received.

Is it too hard to believe that students actually love their fellow students? Because at sometime we may have experienced faith being shared in an "insincere," "manipulative" or "judgmental" way, should we then determine that a student should not take the risk of sharing their faith with others?

The letter also implies that Christianity should not influence people's lives. Christianity is a way of life. Conversion means change, change in the way we live, act and think. It happens in marriage. It happens when we grow in our relationships with God. It is not forced. It is desired.

Romans 12 says, "Be not conformed to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewal of your mind." Change is part of Christian life.

Finally, the pamphlet labeled a "manipulative masterpiece" is entitled "Why Be A Christian." It is written by Ralph Martin, who has been personally encouraged in his writing and speaking by Pope John Paul II. Copies of this pamphlet are available for all who wish to decide for themselves the validity of the comments.

Do college students need a warning to be suspicious of religious groups? Perhaps so, but they do not need to be afraid or judgmental. Perhaps the real warning should be to not go through college without answering the question, "Why am I a Christian?"

Steve Ciarrocca explains stand

To the Editor:

I am writing this letter because I would like to clarify, for the record, why Buddy Accione and I ran for Student Government vice president and president, respectively. Originally we ran for the fun of it, but as the campaign went on we started to realize that what we were doing was of importance to many of our fellow students. Many came up to both Buddy and I expressing feelings of dissatisfaction with the current situation and consequently they were going to vote for us.

Why were these students feeling this way? I can not speak for them, but I can speak for myself in saying that it seems to me that the administration does not truly give a say to the Student Government, which represents the voice of the students.

Reading the article last week, "Don't Knock the Student Government" I can see that the Student Government does do a great deal, but most of it is not of primary importance to the average student. For example, the Student Directory is a great convenience, but nothing that the students would push for if we did not have it.

The Town and Gown committee is more for the administration than the students. It just gives the students a new set of rules to follow on "How to Respect Your Neighbors." The truth is that most students do respect their neighbors and the ones that do not are not going to change when told what to do.

Anything important that the Student Government approves that is primarily for the students seems to be shot down by the administration.

For example, for the 1986-87 budget the Senate approved a $200,000 increase in student loans but the Board of Trustees shot it down. Also for two years in a row the Student Government planned a spring festival that has never happened.

Do not get me wrong, I am not criticizing the Student Government. I believe they are doing a tremendous job. However, the administration has to realize that the Student Government is working on behalf of the students, and the administration is here to help students and meet their needs.

To the student body I would like to say that we must support the Student Government because it will make it considerably easier for them to get things done if the administration knows we are behind them.

Lastly, I would like to thank everyone who helped us with our campaign and voted for us. By the way, Mookie says, "Hi!"

Lewis speaks

To the Editor:

When I first became involved in Student Government in the late spring of 1986, I was astounded at the poor work of the Greg Noone administration. After reviewing the files of Noone, I could find no examples of concrete results-oriented work. In fact, I even found one letter thanking a member of the administration for typing one of his term papers.

Joe Crivelli, in his letter to the editor, argues that Noone is a fine person. That may very well be. However, that is no reflection on his work. I hope that my administration stands on its record of results and not on my personal characteristics.

Elect students as township official

To the Editor:

It is no secret that the Villanova community is treated very unfairly by Radnor and several other local townships. Examples of excessive abuse abound. The housing laws, which cause so much hardship, have been found unconstitutional by the New Jersey Supreme Court.

In order to get approval from the Radnor Township Board of Commissioners to build the two new dorms on South Campus, the University had to set up two escrow accounts "the interest from which shall be the sole property of the township." In essence, Villanova had to submit to a bribe in order to build those dorms.

It is clear that negotiations made in good faith by the University and Student Government have not curbed the hostile demeanor of local governments, I submit that the only recourse left to Villanova is to engage in a concerted effort to influence the political process in our area.

In order to accomplish this ambitious objective, a new organization is being created on campus. The organization will help foster change by, among other things, having Villanova students and supporters run for local offices.

Most organizations on campus, including the University, deal from a position of weakness with respect to its relationship with Radnor Township.

The fundamental difference between this new organization and the others, is that its aim is the attainment of the power itself, rather than pleading to the powerful.

If local public officials continue to turn a deaf ear to the concerns of Villanova, all available resources should be utilized to make those public officials among the unemployed.

Villanova has the economic resources, the human resources and a huge voting block with the potential to do just that. To illustrate the vulnerability of the Radnor commissioners, take note of the fact that the three gentlemen up for re-election next year received an average of only 203 votes in the primary and less than 500 votes in the 1985 general election.

If you are interested in hearing more about this issue, or wish to get involved in some way, I urge you to come to the first meeting. It will be held on Tuesday, Oct. 4 at 4:30 p.m. in the East Lounge of Dougherty Hall. Any interested alumni please come to the meeting or contact me through the Student Activities office.

Police invade house

To the Editor:

A funny thing happened to me this morning. Around 7:30 a.m. there was a loud banging on my door. One of my roommates, half asleep, opened the door a crack to see two policemen and two men from the zoning board standing in front of the door.

After mumbling several words and claiming a search warrant, one of the policemen, about 6'3" and 230 pounds, proceeded to kick in the door, jamming the girl's arm between the wall and the door. Her arm is now badly bruised.

These men continued to rampage up the stairs, throw open all the doors and order everyone in the house to get up and show them identification. I guess this is the way Lower Merion welcomes its new residents.

What happened to my roommates and I is just one of the many stories I have heard about students being taken advantage of by the nearby townships. Although there is an ordinance in the township which states that no more than three unrelated people may live together, the way in which these men handled the situation was appalling.

The girls in my house felt violated and embarrassed to be treated in this manner. The policemen quickly knocked and then banged in the bathroom doors. What if one of the girls was taking a shower?

Schools such as Villanova, Haverford, Bryn Mawr and St. Joseph's bring prestige to the Main Line. More importantly, these universities provide a large amount of capital gained in the area.

Not only do they provide jobs for the community, the students themselves boost the neighborhood economy through shopping in its stores and renting its apartments. Students from these schools may also be found throughout the community performing volunteer services such as Project Sunshine and helping the needy in Philadelphia.

Residents of the Main Line may be proud to speak of these local universities, yet they treat their students as delinquents out to wreak havoc.

Although there are some students who can act inconsiderate towards their neighbors, the house we live in has never looked better and actually improves the neighborhood.

The students of these surrounding universities, being a part of the future of our country, deserve a little more respect. More importantly, they deserve the chance to prove themselves to be a benefit, not a threat, to the community and society.

Huber deserves praise

To the Editor:

Why has there been no excitement on this campus about Vicki Huber? A Villanova student not only makes it to the Olympic track team, but qualifies for the finals in her event and finishes sixth out of 12, ahead of the American favorite for the gold medal. Yet no signs of support or pride appeared anywhere.

We have a world class track team that receives very little attention at Villanova, and women's sports in general are virtually ignored. There are more athletic events here than just football and basketball games. They deserve our support and would be fun to watch. Not only that, they are free.

Maintenance should improve services

To the Editor:

As residents of Katharine Hall, we are writing this letter in reaction to some recent events which have disturbed us considerably.

To preface this letter, we would like to point out that throughout the past two semesters here at Villanova, we have come to regard this as our second home.

Despite these positive feelings, however, recent events have tarnished our image of Villanova. We would like to point out these incidents, not to anger or blame another party or parties, but rather to vent our frustrations and perhaps those of others as well.

First, and seemingly most important, we have experienced a lack of hot water for three days. During this time, we have not been informed as to when this situation is to be rectified, nor have we been given alternatives to taking ice-cold showers.

Subsequently, we have been either walking to nearby St. Monica's Hall or waiting until afternoon or evening when a cold shower seems somewhat more bearable.

Next, we would like to address the maintenance problem. Since Aug. 31, problems have been reported repeatedly without response. These include broken closet doors, failing ventilation units and even something as simple as a burned out fluorescent bulb.

Granted, the maintenance team is undoubtedly busy, but we fail to see the reason for such lack of service. One resident has not been able to rid herself of a cold in part due to the lack of a properly functioning ventilation unit. This same girl has not seen one side of her closet because the door will not open!

Thirdly, we would like to react to the sewage pipe which broke in Donahue Hall. Undeniably, this was a mishap which no one could have predicted, yet we have once again been inconvenienced. Breakfast was cancelled on Sept. 20, and we were not notified until approximately 10:30 p.m., Sept. 19, even though this event occurred shortly after the dinner hour.

Finally, we would like to address the issue of one resident's meal card. This resident lent her card to a friend while she was away for the weekend. This was, as a result, confiscated, and she was to make do without a meal for four days.

We do not condone the fact that she lent her meal card to someone; however, she should have the right to eat upon her return. We fail to see the rationale behind this action since she is paying for these meals.

In conclusion, we would like to point out one fact. We are payng quite a bit of money to attend a school of this caliber and reputation. We do so without regret.

However, when we are forced to deal with these recent events we begin to wonder: Where is our money really going, and does Villanova really care about its students as much as we would like to think it does?

Karate chops its way to popularity

By JANE BUTLER
Staff Reporter

You will not find an old Okinawan man demonstrating "Wax on, wax off" in his backyard. You will not receive a crash course in trimming bonsai trees. What you will find at Villanova's Karate Club is dedicated, caring instructors, eager students and a lot of hard work.

Active since 1971, the Karate Club has gradually become one of the largest clubs on campus, this year boasting over 100 members. Villanova's equivalent to "The Karate Kid's" Pat Morita is Jim Toolan, a 34-year-old attorney and Villanova alumnus.

From 1977 to 1978, Toolan was the North American Light Heavyweight Kickboxing Champion, and at present he is the highest ranking non-Japanese jodo (Japanese sword and stick fighting) competitor in the U.S.

Accompanied by 10 other black belts, Toolan instructs students in a style of karate called Okinawan ShorinRyu. Each black belt is referred to as "sensei" (meaning teacher), with Toolan as the head.

What makes Villanova's Karate Club different than most karate schools? The answer is affordable, quality instruction and unsurpassed dedication. Students pay dues of $40 per semester. Compared to $65 per month at the average karate school, the fee appears minimal, especially for the supreme quality of instruction students receive.

As Toolan proudly claims, students get "instruction you wouldn't get anywhere else." He further challenges you to find a school with as many black belt senseis as the club boasts. Not only are the teachers numerous, but they are also very dedicated. They spend three hours, twice a week, teaching others for no pay.

The bi-weekly classes are divided into two levels. Beginners practice from 7 p.m. to 8 p.m., while advanced students go from 7 p.m. to 9:30 p.m.

Classes follow a ritualistic format, beginning with a group show of respect and thanks to karate's founder and the senseis. While bowing on their knees, the class repeats in Japenese, "Teacher, show me the way." Once this ritual is complete, the class is officially ready to begin.

After a 20-minute warm-up, students advance to more difficult stretches and exercises, including sit-ups and push-ups. The remaining class time is then devoted to learning and practicing a variety of punches, kicks and self-defense maneuvers.

Sensei Dan McCormick notes that for beginners, sparring does not take place until second semester, when one's "stomach is actually ready to take a punch."

Students have the opportunity to advance into different belts by taking a test after each semester. The order of belt levels is: white,

Soviet life unmasked in campus lecture

By BRIAN KNESTOUT
Staff Reporter

Following the age-old doctrine to "know your enemy," Villanova's Naval R.O.T.C. program hosted a presentation by the Chief of Naval Operations and Naval Intelligence on Sept. 20 in the Villanova Room.

It was entitled "Soviet Naval Power," and it provided deep insights into the education, training, psychology and philosophy of the Soviet navy. It culminated in an enlightening and entertaining view of the American and Soviet navies through Soviet eyes.

The presentation opened with a videotape of impromptu interviews with average Soviet citizens. At first distrustful and quiet, the people invariably warmed to the television cameras and expressed their desire for peace with the United States.

Their perception of the American citizen was that of a very friendly and peace-loving person, while they distrusted the American government as a bloodthirsty warmonger. This view was also reflected in the various Soviet posters hung on the wlls of the Villanova Room. Reminiscent of World War II propaganda posters, they projected the wary, distrustful attitude towards the United States which is usually attributed to Soviet citizens.

This attitude was explained in the next part of the presentation, which gave a brief history of the Soviet Union, emphasizing the fact that 20 million Soviets were killed in World War II. This tragedy, which shook Soviet society, is still being felt today, and has fostered a national defensive paranoia.

Combined with a government which controls every aspect of Soviet life, it has created a nation which is determined to protect itself militarily from any threat, real or imagined, and which is preparing its children to enter

'Nova aids Olympics

By ABIGAIL KUNATH

While Olympic athletes from around the world presently compete in Seoul, on Nov. 4 Villanova will welcome some very special olympians to participate in the 1988 Pennsylvania Special Olympics (PASO) Eastern State Soccer Tournament. The Special Olympics is an athletic competition for children and adults with mental retardation.

Villanova hosted its first Special Olympics program in 1979. Over the years, it has expanded tremendously. This year an estimated 300 athletes will take part in the events.

The Special Olympics will arrive on Nov. 4 and depart on Nov. 6. Saturday's events will commence with the opening ceremonies and a parade of athletes, followed by the soccer tournament and various other competitions testing the individualized and developmental soccer skills of more severely handicapped athletes.

The day's events will also feature basketball, football and tennis clinics, as well as numerous other attractions, including Greek and club-sponsored game booths.

Games Director Elia DiTaddeo, along with five vice-chairpeople and 22 games committee members, have been organizing this year's Special Olympics since January. In spite of the tremendous amount of time and effort required to make the Special Olympics successful, as DiTaddeo stated, "To see the looks on the Greeks' dry party a success

By R. MICHAEL BULLOTTA
Features Editor

When someone mentions a college party, a fraternity party nonetheless, what do you think of? Your conception probably includes music, dancing, a catchy theme and, of course, beer. It seems that one of the principal ingredients of the social recipe at colleges is, and has always been, some form of alcoholic beverage. After all, it takes a few drinks and a good "buzz" to have fun, right? Wrong.

On Saturday night, Sept. 24, two Greek organizations, the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity and the Alpha Phi sorority, held a very unusual kind of party.

By 8:30 p.m., at the Be Bop Cafe in King of Prussia, the music was pulsating loudly, the dance floor packed with partiers and the dress was beach attire. The unusual part — no alcohol whatsoever.

As an experiment to prove to the Villanova community, and to themselves, that a fun party can be a non-alcoholic one, as well as to reduce liability and the chance of an alcohol-related accident, these two Greek organizations put themselves and their social budgets on the line. The big question on the minds of the organizers of this bash — will people really come to a party with no alcohol?

The answer, fortunately, was, "Of course!" Over 100 Villanova undergraduates showed up from Sigma Phi Epsilon and Alpha Phi to hang out, mingle and dance the night away at one of the area's premiere night clubs.

With the waves that alcohol can cause in the lives of students, especially amidst the new sea of Pennsylvania statutes, it may be that these two groups have set a trend for the future of Villanova's student social life. At least one thing is certain; people can thoroughly enjoy themselves at a party without inebriation.

As one partygoer from Sigma Phi Epsilon put it, "So what if the hardest drink I can order is a Diet Coke with a twist of lime. The important thing is that I'm with my friends. Besides, I'm having a blast!"

Since the beginning of the school year, Radnor House has been plagued by serious parking problems.

Radnor House parking crisis; solution at last?

By MICHAEL TERZIAN
Staff Reporter

One of the more typical questions upperclass Villanova students receive upon beginning the new school year is, "Where are you living this year?" For many of us, the reply is "Radnor House."

Despite the fact that Radnor House is within walking distance of campus, many students who live there own a car and use it every day. It is because of this simple fact that a very perplexing problem develops: Why is there a shortage of parking spaces at Radnor House?

A few common sights in the Radnor House parking lots are cars parked on the curb, others squeezed into spaces, and usually a few cars driving aimlessly throughout the lots hunting for a space.

According to the property manager for Radnor House, Lisa Nordell, the answer to the parking problem is more complicated than one would first believe.

"Part of the problem is that this building was built 33 years ago, and the parking arrangement reflects the time," said Nordell.

Stringent Radnor Township legislation has contributed to this delay in the construction of another parking lot.

She stated that over the years the developers have spent more money on internal renovations, such as the boiler room and windows, rather than parking. These additional costs have led to a delay in expanding the parking area.

Furthermore, Nordell added, stringent Radnor Township legislation has contributed to this delay in the construction of another parking lot. This should not be surprising to students, due to the fact that the University has faced similar problems with expansion and Radnor Township.

Added to these reasons for the overcrowded lots is the confirmation of a rumor that has been circulating about the parking stickers currently being used. These stickers are red and white and slightly larger than a pack of matches.

It is rumored that they are identical to the stickers used last year, and the people who used them last year are continuing to use them. If these people do not live in Radnor House, this is an unauthorized usage of the lots, which is contributing to the overcrowding.

Nordell confirmed that this was, in fact, the case.

"Yes, old ones are being used." New stickers for 1989 will be issued in the next two weeks. They will be completely different from the old ones.

"You kids are clever, so I've been waiting for everyone to settle in before issuing them, so that only Radnor House tenants receive the new stickers. A proof of identification will be needed to obtain one," said Nordell.

Along with the new parking stickers, which should eliminate unauthorized parking, construction of a new parking lot is finally underway. With these measures being taken, some relief may come to the overcrowding problem.

Patience and cooperation on behalf of both the Radnor House Condominium Association and Villanova students is necessary, however, during the interim.

According to Lisa Nordell, this should not be long. "It's very important that students can come home at night. Definitely more spaces will open up within the next two weeks."

Soviet lifestyles examined

military service. The Soviet youth groups, equivalent to the Boy and Girl Scouts, provide Soviet boys and girls with military training, and all Soviet high school students must complete 140 hours of basic training, including simple tactics and weapons instruction.

Training does not end with high school, since there is a universal draft for all. After induction and throughout their military lives, the Soviet soldier is subjected to an incessant political education, emphasizing the superiority of the teachings of Lenin and his communist philosophy. This results in a society which admires and praises the soldier in the Soviet Union, and which advocates honorable service in the military.

The most fascinating part of the evening came after the historical background. An American naval officer, posing as a Soviet officer, presented a thoroughly Soviet viewpoint.

He exhibited the swelling pride and love the Soviet soldier feels for his country, and also displayed the attitude which is instilled in Soviet military personnel. This example of a cocky, aggressive and boastful Soviet officer insulting the American military and praising the virtues of Soviet society was especially unsettling.

The combined effect of the various parts of the program provided an excellent overview of the Soviet soldier's mentality and motivation. It showed how an average Soviet citizen can be molded through his culture and his environment into a patriotic fighting soldier.

athletes' faces makes it all worth it."

There is clearly a large amount of support on behalf of the student body. Over 300 volunteers attended the Special Olympics informational meeting.

They help in various ways, including refereeing the activities and serving as "huggers." Two huggers are assigned to each athlete, cheering him or her on throughout the day and accompanying the athlete to meals, events and clinics. Volunteer forms can be filled out in the Special Olympics office in 108 Dougherty Hall. One-hour "hugger" training sessions will take place on Oct. 26 and 27.

The Special Olympics offer its athletes a chance to express themselves athletically, giving them a sense of pride and accomplishment.

"These kids see this as the Olympics, and it is for them," says Joan Tebeau, in charge of the team soccer skills committee.

In spite of each athelete's determination to reach their goal, brutal competition does not invade the atmosphere. Personal achievement is what Special Olympians strive to achieve.

Former "hugger" Kerin McCormick states, "They don't care if they win or lose, they just want to do their best. Everyone wins and everyone gets a medal."

The Special Olympics program allows its athletes and volunteers to join together, breaking the social barriers that people with mental disabilities frequently encounter. Special Olympics opens our eyes to all that these athletes have achieved, rather than to their disabilities.

The National Order of Omega

proudly presents

VILLANOVA'S GREEK OF THE WEEK

Nick Worthington comes to Villanova from the booming metropolis of Allentown, Pa. A senior political science major, Nick has been a brother of Sigma Nu for four years.

"Quick" Nick, as the girls in his favorite sorority, Alpha Phi, call him, is always ready to lend a hand on Greek projects. In IFC, Nick has been the festivals chairperson for two years besides being Sigma Nu's IFC representative for three years. Nick is also very active in his own chapter serving as assistant pledge marshall and chairperson of the First Annual Can Food Drive.

Nick exercised his massive physique in all intramural sports. His athletic honors include captain of the Sigma Nu football team and the Meanest Looking Lineman Award. Although, he hates to admit it, it is rumored that Nick is a good friend of Joe Critelli, which in itself made him worthy of this award. (Just kidding Nick!)

For all of his achievements and contributions, the Order of Omega is proud to announce Nick Worthington of Sigma Nu Fraternity, this week's Greek of the Week.

Students get kicks

yellow, green, brown and black, each level having various degrees within it. Toolan estimates that a beginner, training 4 to 5 days per week, could earn his black belt in roughly 5 years.

Students can also get involved with NCAA Competition, as well as with the elimination competition for the 1992 Olympics, through their participation in the club.

An interesting aspect of the class is the great emphasis on self-discipline. For instance, no one is allowed to wipe sweat from his or her brow. As unappealing as this practice may be, it supports the assertion that a competitor must always be on guard; when one takes time to wipe his brow, his opponent has the opportunity to strike.

In addition to this practice, whenever a student strays from the lead of the head sensei, he must do push-ups to teach himself not to lose concentration. Such disciplinary actions demonstrate how karate aims to train the mind as well as the body.

Like many students, freshman Jason Douglas joined the club to get into good physical shape. But, as sensei Charlie Boland points out, "Karate is also about self-confidence, peace of mind, purpose and discipline."

"It is a great way to blow off steam and it is a good way to put structure and discipline into your life," adds McCormick.

When asked what she likes most about the club, one sophomore replied, the fact "that the instructor really cares." Another aspect she enjoys is the relatively even number of males and females participating. Of approximately 100 students, about 40 are female.

Pa. laws crack down on drinking

breeze right through."

Right now, according to Shuman, the country is in an uproar over "drinking in general, underage drinking in particular, and drinking on college campuses especially." New Jersey, in response to the Rutgers incident, has introduced a similar piece of legislation and Delaware is in the process of introducing one.

And so ... the law. Basically it falls into two categories: crimes of underage drinking and crimes of possession and use of false identification.

"The law in Pennsylvania states that anyone under 21 commits a crime if they purchase, possess, transport or consume any alcoholic beverage or attempt to do any of these," explained Shuman. "Not just buying it, not just drinking it. If somebody is in a car with a six pack of beer unopened on the back seat, it's a crime because he is possessing and transporting it."

Shuman went on to say that police in some areas, not in Philadelphia, but in some outlying counties, are in the habit of seizing and forfeiting automobiles used in the transportation of large quantities of alcohol by underage drivers. The police will keep the car for good.

The penalty for a first offense under this section includes a possible $300 fine, possible term of imprisonment up to 90 days, and a mandatory suspension of all driving privileges — first offense 90 days, second offense one year, two years for every subsequent offense. This suspension is mandatory and without exception. No judge may set this penalty aside for any reason including employment, school or even emergency.

The next section, possession of false identification, carries with it a penalty of a $300 fine for a first offense, $500 and a possible 90-day jail sentence for a second offense and a mandatory license suspension upon first offense.

False ID is any card that has been changed, any card that is totally false, and possession of another person's legal ID. This section covers not only use of false identification, but simple possession as well.

Misrepresentation of age to secure alcoholic beverage is the next section, carrying a first offense fine of $300 and suspension of driver's license and a possible 90 days in jail. A second offense increases the fine to $500.

"Misrepresentation," Shuman said, "is something as simple as walking into a beer distributor or walking into a bar and saying 'Give me a six-pack,' because of the signs displayed in a conspicuous spot that say 'You must be 21 years of age to purchase alcoholic beverages.'"

There are five offenses under the new law which carry mandatory license suspensions. They are underage drinking, possession of false ID, misrepresentation of age to secure alcoholic beverage, drunk driving and refusal to take a breath test.

If a person is convicted of more than one of these offenses in a single event the terms must be served consecutively.

"For example," Dr. Shuman said, "you show a false ID to buy a six-pack of beer and are caught drinking — underage drinking, misrepresentation of age to secure alcoholic beverage and possession of false ID ... 90 days, one year, two years. Three years and three months is the total suspension of your driving privilege."

Regardless of the state a license is issued, the privilege can be taken away under this law. The revocation is effective in 49 of the 50 states, with Florida being the only state not complying. Driving in any of the consenting 49 states on a license suspended for an alcohol-related incident carries with it a mandatory penalty of a $1,000 fine and 90 days imprisonment.

Pennsylvania has a new crime in this law regarding ID called, "manufacture, distribution or sale of false identification." This crime is a felony. It includes something as simple as giving someone else your ID, now considered to be distribution.

"The manufacture of false driver's licenses is one of the fastest growing industries in the state. It occurs almost exclusively on college campuses," Shuman said. "A convicted felon, whether they receive a sentence or not, can never be a CPA, never be a lawyer, never be a doctor or an accountant. You can never go into the armed services and you are subject to the criminal registration act."

The final part of the law, section 6310.1 of the Pennsylvania crimes code, is a brand new crime of furnishing alcoholic beverages to minors. Any person who sells, gives, provides to or furnishes any alcohol to a person under 21 is guilty of a crime. Furnishing is now defined to include to give to, provide to, or allow a minor to possess alcohol on your premises or property, or on premises or property you control, including a rented house or hall.

The penalty for this offense carries a maximum penalty of a $2,500 fine and one-year imprisonment. The mandatory, minimum penalty is a $1,000 fine for a first offense and a $2,500 fine for each subsequent offense. This becomes the basis for civil liability.

"Anyone who serves a minor, allows a minor to be served, or allows a minor to possess alcoholic beverage on their property," Shuman said, "is absolutely responsible in money damages for all the harm that results."

This is an uninsurable risk. It is against the law for an insurance company to provide insurance which pays to cover losses that result in an intentional criminal act, in this case furnishing alcohol to minors.

The problem that arises at this point is enforcement. Is this law enforceable?

"Governor Casey," Shuman pointed out, "has put together an elite task force of 300 state troopers whose only job, only job, is enforcement of the underage drinking laws. Nothing else ... they can't write tickets on their way down the turnpike to the raids."

The entire state police force is 2,200 troopers. That means almost one-seventh of the Pennsylvania police force is committed solely to the underage drinking act. It will be enforced.

According to Shuman, in the first 60 days under the new law, just under 1,800 licenses were suspended. It is predicted that there will be 55,000 suspensions in the first 12 months.

"They are going after this with a fury, folks," Shuman said. "The trend is lessening towards serving adults and is tightening up on serving minors."

Greeks react to new laws

By KARLA BECKNER
Staff Reporter

"This is a time of crisis of Greeks," said Dr. Arthur Shuman at a lecture to the Greek leaders of LaSalle University Sept. 20. "Seventeen colleges and universities across the country have eliminated their Greek systems in the past four months. You can just count on the fact that at every college and university in America the Vice President for Student Life, student affairs or whatever, is sitting down, taking a piece of paper, drawing a line down the middle and putting the pros on one side and cons on the other."

The new Pennsylvania drinking laws have hit college Greek systems especially hard. They are an obvious target for the legislature and police forces enforcing the law because they are so easily identified.

The incident at Rutgers University last year, and a similar situation a few weeks ago at the University of Delaware, have forced the country to take another look at Greek systems, and in taking that second look, Greeks are put in jeopardy.

"Now more than ever," Shuman, moderator of Phi Kappa Theta fraternity at LaSalle, said, "the positive involvements of Greeks need to be emphasized."

Shuman said that the view of the average fraternity today is one of little activity other than drinking. That view has to change. Greeks need to publicize the good things they do for the school and community.

Under the new drinking law, Greeks are caught in section 6310.1, furnishing alcoholic beverages to minors. By permitting any minor to consume or possess alcohol on property they control, they are breaking the law, and the fines are steep.

"To illustrate," Shuman said, "if a fraternity has a party and the police raid it, finding 11 underage drinkers present, only 11, it's a $26,000 fine. Each person is considered a separate offense and the law mandates a $1,000 fine for the first offense and $2,500 for each subsequent offense."

If a fraternity is having a party and the police raid it, finding 11 underage drinkers present, only 11, it's a $26,000 fine.

—LaSalle professor Dr. Arthur Shuman

Terrance Dalton, president of the Pi Kappa Phi fraternity, noted they have undergone a drastic change.

"Our supreme chapter law states that we may not purchase alcohol with fraternity funds. We will now be sponsoring dry rushes and dry pledging. We're trying to create an atmosphere that is not tuned to drinking," he said.

According to Dalton, Pi Kappa Phi is looking to switch liability at social functions to a bar or hall, an idea strongly advocated by Dr. Shuman.

Shuman strongly urges Greeks to hold their social events at halls where they can leave the responsibility of carding guests and serving alcohol to the management. This releases the Greek organization of any responsibility. The establishment, by handling the carding, has maintained control of the premises. They are now liable.

"The judgments we're now seeing against parties furnishing to minors, especially in academic situations are monstrous," Shuman said. "Penn State University has a $27 million lawsuit pending for an incident involving an off-campus fraternity. Lehigh just paid $2.5 million three weeks ago. Temple just paid $5.5 million to the parents of two kids who were on their way home from a party at a professor's house."

John Mooney, president of the Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity, said they have become much more risk-conscious.

"We've always had a sober committee at parties and we've always had designated drivers, but we've become more aware of risk management. We'll be instituting a risk management chairman for the fraternity."

According to Mooney, the and several other fraternity and sorority presidents, including Craig Zapetti of Lambda Chi Alpha, Dan Dougherty of Sigma Phi Epsilon, Tim Lindon of Sigma Pi, Myken Wilson of Kappa Alpha Theta, Phyllis Downs of Alpha Phi and Michelle Veix, president of the Pan-Hellenic Council, have outlined some safety guidelines for fraternities and sororities. They met to take the best parts of these guidelines to present to the Interfraternity Council and Pan-Hellenic Council.

Vasey enhances college life

By LUCI A. JANKOWSKI
Staff Reporter

The Villanova community is fortunate to have an exciting artistic treasure in its midst, namely the Villanova Theatre. A production at the Villanova Theatre is a cultural aspect of the "college experience" that no student should go without. The theatre provides its audience with a glimpse of the human experience that one can often identify with; yet, it does so in a provocative and entertaining way. The 1988-89 season, A Celebration of Women through Theatre, promises to do just that.

Throughout history, women have contributed a great deal to the development of theatre as heroines, actresses, designers, playwrights and directors. Their dedication and vision are examples which helped form the theatre, as it is known today.

Villanova's theatre season pays tribute to the spirit of these women through a series of six dynamic plays. Three of the plays are the work of highly-acclaimed and innovative female playwrights: Carson McCullers, Emily Mann and Caryl Churchill.

The other three represent the work of the playwrights Euripides, Henrik Ibsen and George Bernard Shaw. These male playwrights reject the female stereotype in favor of examining dynamic, intelligent and challenging women characters.

The season opens Oct. 5 with "The Member of the Wedding," Carson McCullers' touching American comedy about a young Southern girl who learns about love, death and friendship while under the protective wing of her family's black housekeeper.

Immediately following this production in late October will be Emily Mann's award-winning documentary, "Still Life." It is based on the actual experience of three people and explores the effects of Vietnam-engendered violence in its many forms — political, domestic, sexual and artistic.

The fall semester closes in early December with Euripides' classical tragedy, "Iphigenia in Aulis," which depicts the sacrifice of Iphigenia at the hands of her father, Agamemnon and raises questions about human relationships and ultimate loyalties to family and country.

The celebration resumes in February with Henrik Ibsen's masterpiece, "Hedda Gabler," which explores a woman's struggle for individuality within the constraints of marriage and society. The tables turn in April with "My Fair Lady," as Eliza Doolittle teaches her linguistics professor, Henry Higgins, a deeper lesson about love and human dignity in Lerner and Loewe's romantic musical adaptation of G.B. Shaw's "Pygmalion."

The finale to the season is provided by Caryl Churchill's innovative and humorously ironic drama. "Top Girls," in which the playwright questions the pursuit of professional success at the expense of family relationships and human sensitivity.

Theatre-goers are further invited to explore the messages presented in the productions by attending topic-related discussions. These discussions will take place after the first Friday's showing of each play and will be led by guest speakers from the Philadelphia/Main Line areas. "The Member of the Wedding's" Sunday matinee performance will be followed by an additional panel discussion.

Do not let this school-year pass by without attending one or more of the exciting Villanova Theatre productions. Your "college experience" is not complete without it.

Frankie Adams (Megan Bellwoar) and her cousin John Henry West (Ian Westerfer) listen to Berenice's (Irma Mason) comforting song in "The Member of the Wedding," which opens at Vasey Theatre on Oct. 5.

Performance dates for "The Member of the Wedding" are Oct. 5 through 9 and 11 through 16. Evening performances begin at 8 p.m., Sunday matinees at 2 p.m. For information about tickets call the Villanova Theatre Box Office at 645-7474, or go directly to the Box Office in Vasey Hall weekdays from 1 to 5 p.m.

Def Leppard incites the Spectrum crowd

By ALLEN AMBROSINO
and JEFF GILLIES
Assistant Entertainment Editors

On Sept. 25, the Spectrum was packed with rock and roll fans ranging from children in their early teens to those who probably attended Woodstock 20 years ago. The event was Def Leppard's second appearance at the Spectrum this year, after a long hiatus following the release of the hugely successful Pyromania album in 1983. The result was a night of incredibly energetic rock and roll that incited thunderous crowd response from start to finish.

Since the stage was centered in the middle of the arena, everyone had a great view and the sound was perhaps the best ever at a show of this type. This concept of a centered stage was one of the most enjoyable aspects of the concert and allowed the bands to involve every section of the arena in their performances.

Queensryche, a band little known to most hard rock fans, gave a spirited and explosive performance that surely brought some heavy metal fans out of the closest. Playing new material from Operation: mindcrime and old standards such as "Queen of the Reich" and "Take Hold of the Flame," Queensryche, led by singer Geoff Tate and the relentless drumming of Scott Rockenfield, did an excellent job of setting the tone for the night.

When the curtains fell, surrounding the center arena stage with the Def Leppard and Hysteria logos, the crowd immediately sprang to their feet. From that point on, the noise level continued to build. As the AC/DC song on the sound system began to wind down, Rick Allen's drums could be heard and the capacity crowd exploded with anticipation.

When the lights went out, Def Leppard made their presence known in impressive fashion. Opening with "Stagefright" and then tearing into "Rock, Rock," the band had the audience in a state of complete euphoria. The well-timed light show and the synchronized movements of the band members added to the atmosphere, exciting the crowd even more.

"Women" and a slowed-down version of "Too Late For Love" followed. The latter was greeted with thousands of tiny flames from cigarette lighters and singer Joe Elliot initiated the first sing-a-long of the evening.

Lasers emerged from the stage as "Hysteria" was played. At first, the lasers shot into the crowd revolving in a circular motion. Shortly after, they projected on two screens, spelling out the word "Hysteria," which was also a perfect description of the general condition of the Spectrum at the time.

An uneventful Steve Clark solo, more laser effects on "Gods of War" and an acoustic version of "Bringin' on the Heartbreak" were next.

Other highlights included a very upbeat version of "Animal," complete with the pause at the end, which was replaced by the screams from the crowd. "Pour Some Sugar On Me" was definitely the biggest crowd pleaser and was preceeded by an Elliot discourse on sex, a topic of which the audience heartily approved. Elliot then proceeded to pick up a packet of sugar from the stage and the second he held it up in the air, the noise level skyrocketed to the point where it felt like the arena would collapse.

The encore set featured their latest single, "Love Bites," which lost some of its appeal in the live setting. Also included was their smash hit "Photograph."

Although the crowd wanted more, Def Leppard called it a night.

The show is among the best that is touring today and is a must see for all rock fans. It is quite unusual to find a mixture of excellent sound quality and a well choreographed show where the music is still the main focus. These qualities are what separate Def Leppard from the typical rock band.

Riding high on the success of their No. 1 album, Hysteria, Def Leppard entranced the Spectrum on Sept. 25 and 26.

Book accurately depicts youth

By JACQUELINE GENTILE
Assistant Features Editor

A novel that critics have praised as a modern day Catcher in the Rye, The Mysteries of Pittsburgh, by Michael Chabon, focuses on a young man's gain of self knowledge.

Set in Pittsburgh, where the protagonist, Art Bechstein, has just graduated from college, the novel is about one zany and unforgettable summer during which Bechstein comes to terms with his gangster father and the mysterious death of his mother. He is beguiled by Phlox, his love interest, and bewitched by both his namesake, Arthur Lecomte, and by Cleveland Arning.

Born in Washington D.C., Chabon received his B.A. from the University of Pittsburgh and his M.F.A. from the University of California at Irvine. His stories have appeared in The New Yorker. The Mysteries of Pittsburgh, Chabon's first novel, also functioned as his master's thesis.

Throughout the novel, Bechstein's father appears when he takes time off from his "vague business trips" to visit with his son over meals at exclusive restaurants. He has a genuine concern for his son, wanting to give him "college and 'unsoiled hands,'" but the communication between them is superficial, and Bechstein has always remained aloof from his father's business. At the end of these visits, Bechstein returns to his summer; work at Boardwalk Books and life in his apartment on the Terrace.

Lecomte is the homosexual who walks into Bechstein's summer. He fascinates, but at the same time unnerves, Bechstein, who has at times doubted his heterosexuality. Through Lecomte, Bechstein meets Arning, as well as the alluring and strangely beautiful Phlox, his summer love. A biker and a heavy drinker, Arning earns his living illegally yet remains an idealist who dreams of "searchlights and giant women" and whose philosophy on life consists of a "will-to-bigness."

The friends spend their summer leisurely; eating, drinking, talking and dreaming. But conflict arises in the form of a twisted love triangle as Bechstein becomes increasingly entranced by Lecomte.

Bechstein's father then reenters the picture, more prominently now, because throughout the summer he has sensed that his son is becoming "strange" and is

Record Roundup. . .Metallica, Erasure

By ANDREW MATHIS

. . . And Justice For All
Metallica
Elektra Records
½

In what is perhaps the most anxiously awaited speed metal release ever, Metallica has shown a few things. They have shown that they are still one of the tightest acts around. They have shown that they can write songs about something other than death. However, they have also shown that they can release an album that is a shabby follow-up to their previous material. They have shown all of this with their latest release, . . . And Justice for All.

Make no mistakes, Metallica is still exhibiting great musicianship on the part of singer/guitarist James Hetfield, guitarist Kirk Hammett, drummer Lars Ulrich, and newcomer Jason Newsted, the replacement for late bassist Cliff Burton. The rhythm section is still impeccably together, the solos are still sizzling, and Hetfield is still the best metal voice around. The lyrics are also still up to par. However, in the process of putting words and music together, something is missing.

Of course, the album is not a complete loss. "Blackened," which opens the album, starts off in a very promising way, and a great solo by Hammett makes up for a weak bridge. This is the case with a few other songs on the album, including the title track. With very few exceptions, this album lacks songs which are non-stop powerhouses from beginning to end, like Metallica's previous work.

Besides the title track, two other songs open with acoustic introductions courtesy of Hetfield. "One," a song about a war victim complete with war sounds (generated by synthesizer, presumably), has good acoustic work, but follows suit with most of the album in its weaknesses. On the other hand, "To Live is to Die," which also opens acoustically, is perhaps the best instrumental that the band has ever produced. Complete with spoken words penned by the late Burton, it is a step above Metallica's previous instrumental efforts.

That instrumental and "Dyer's Eve," which closes the album, are the only real saving graces for an otherwise mediocre record. Strangely enough, while most of the album's lyrics are sarcastic social commentary, Metallica seems to be at their best when they return to the good old death motif. With Hammett's best solo work, "Dyer's Eve" is the album's best song.

The problems for this album lie in a few areas. First, the album is not as well-produced as Master of Puppets or Ride the Lightning, and therefore lacks the cutting edge that Metallica's second and third LPs do. Also, the songs on . . . And Justice for All are entirely too long. The shortest song on the album clocks in at over five minutes and for the nine songs on the album there totals over 65 minutes of music. Obviously, the songs would not be so tiresome if they kept up the intensity that they begin with, another problem on this album.

For now, Metallica fans must settle for second best. At any rate, whatever Metallica releases will be worshipped by speed metal fans no matter what quality it is. For those of you who caught Metallica this summer at Monsters of Rock and heard them for the first time, seek refuge in Metallica's earlier releases. This time they have missed their mark.

Innovativeness prevails throughout Erasure's latest album, The Innocents. The music, all synthesized, sounds crisp, clear and sleek. The lyrics, along with the tone of the album, are meaningful and significant.

There are two members of Erasure: Vince Clark and Andy Bell. Back-up vocals on a few of the songs included Naomi Osborne, Caron Wheeler and Jane Ayre. Clark and Bell wrote virtually every song on the album.

Vince Clark originally started Depeche Mode, also known for their use of synthesizers. He eventually left Depeche Mode and started Yazaoo (later shortened to Yaz) with Alison Moyet. Yaz broke up after only two albums, and Moyet went on to pursue a solo career.

Clark, wanting to start a new band and gain a new partner interviewed many people. He finally found Andy Bell and formed Erasure.

The Innocents is a delightful mixture of both dance tracks and ballads. This makes the album easier to listen to because it flows from song to song. One already released dance track off the album is "Chains of Love," which is doing well in the top 40 singles charts. The video is also getting a lot of airplay on MTV.

The album starts off with another excellent dance track, "A Little Respect." This is a sweet love song that begins the album on a happy note. The song is not shallow, but rings true with deep meaning and thought.

Love songs do not dominate The Innocents either. Many of the songs become serious and deal with sobering subjects such as pregnancy ("Phantom Bride"), the uncertain future ("Hallowed Ground"), and even God ("Yahoo!"). These diversified themes are communicated associating with people that he would disapprove of.

Chabon then goes through the final tumultuous days of summer as the emotions of all the characters reach a peak before the swift conclusion of the book.

The "dizzy, . . . dull, . . . lovely, dire summer" as Bechstein describes it is dealt with artfully by Chabon. His vivid depiction of the characters through their lifestyles, looks, problems and relationships with each other make them come to life for the reader. His descriptions of lazy, idyllic summertime delights fill the reader with a strong sense of nostalgia. Using humor and sentiment, Chabon deals skillfully with delicate subjects. Even through a twisted love triangle, Chabon focuses on human nature, desires, joy and pain in a manner that evokes from the reader feelings of empathy for Bechstein.

Most impressive is the manner in which Chabon handles the tender situation between father and son. The depiction of both Bechstein and his father as people who truly love each other but have grown apart, provides such delicate scenes that the reader is made to feel that he could be Bechstein, feeling both love for and separation from his father.

The Mysteries of Pittsburgh is valuable reading for its true to life characters, but it is most of all worthwhile for its startlingly accurate depiction of a youth who is experiencing a loss of innocence and the unsure beginnings of adulthood.

Batman hits big screen

By STEPHEN POWERS
Staff Reporter

In movie news this week, Warner Brothers is finally getting its big-screen version of "Batman" off the ground — with big name stars like Michael Keaton and Jack Nicholson. Although the studio has been discussing the project for several years, script and casting problems had placed it on the back burner. Now, Keaton, who found success earlier this year in "Beetlejuice" and the dramatic "Clean and Sober," will play the title role and his alter-ego Bruce Wayne. Oscar-winner Nicholson should be perfect as his arch-enemy, the Joker.

Other members of the cast include Sean Young ("No Way Out") as Vicki Vale, a photographer for the Gotham Globe who also is Bruce's love interest. Robert Wuhl, who portrayed the coach in the summer hit "Bull Durham," will also appear in a major role. No word yet on who will play Robin.

On a similar note, the long-running Dick Tracy comic strip will also be the basis for a new feature film. Warren Beatty, who has peddled the idea from Universal to Paramount to Fox, has finally struck a deal with Disney to produce and star in the movie. The other studios reportedly turned him down because of his demands for a $5 million salary, a $25 million budget and 15 percent of the film's profits. Because of the failure of Beatty's last film, "Ishtar," Disney got him for less.

Moore Changes: There was more turmoil on the set of CBS' "Mary Tyler Moore" last week as the producers announced a new co-star for their leading lady. Edward Moore (no relation) has been dropped from the new romantic comedy because the producers say that he is not ethnic enough to contrast with the WASP-ish Mary. Denis Arndt, who is mainly known for his work on the stage, is Mary's new husband, and he and Moore are busy re-shooting the opening episode.

Oscar-winning Nicholson should be perfect as his arch-enemy, the Joker.

The casting change reflects CBS' desire to make Moore's latest series as different as possible from her classic "Mary Tyler Moore Show," which ran from 1970-77. Her 1985 sitcom "Mary" was basically a clone of the original, and lasted for only 13 episodes.

The new show will focus on the marriage between the white-collar Annie Block (Moore), her working-class husband and their children from previous marriages. John Randolph plays his father, a staunch conservative, who feuds with her mother, a New York liberal played by Eileen Heckart (she was Mary's aunt in the original series).

The show is set to premiere Oct. 26 at 8:30 p.m.

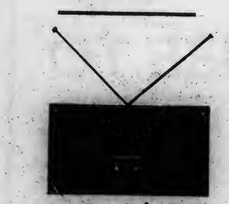
More Recasting: Will there be a new Pam Ewing on "Dallas" this season? The answer is: maybe. Since negotiations with Victoria Principal are going nowhere, Principal look-alike Margaret Michaels has been signed to appear on the CBS soap — but only for one episode so far.

In the storyline, Pam's brother learns that Pam, who was in a car accident and had plastic surgery (oooh, how original), is in Europe and he goes to find her. What will most likely happen is this: he will find the woman (Michaels) he thinks is Pam and she will deny it and send him away. If Principal decides not to return to the show, then Michaels will turn out to be Pam after all. Confused now? You may or may not figure this out after "Dallas" starts its 11th season on Oct. 28.

Short Takes: If you missed the Sonny and Cher reunion on "Late Night with David Letterman" last year: NBC will repeat it on Oct. 6. That episode, which earned "Letterman" its highest rating ever, will follow an original, which airs an hour earlier in place of "The Tonight Show" . . . Anthony Andrews has dropped out of ABC's strike-delayed "A Fine Romance." Christopher Cazenove, who played Ben on "Dynasty," will replace him when the show premieres in January . . . Aretha Franklin will sing the opening theme of NBC's "A Different World," when it starts its second season next Thursday . . . VCR Alert: Channel 6 is broadcasting the classic original "Caddyshack," with Rodney Dangerfield and Chevy Chase, tomorrow night at 11:30 p.m. However, be aware that this version will probably be edited . . . "The Great Escape," a new syndicated travel show that premieres Oct. 8, has scrapped an already-filmed episode on Cancun, which sustained heavy damage during Hurrican Gilbert . . . "L.A. Law's" real-life spouses Michael Tucker and Jill Eikenberry star in ABC's "A Family Again," about parents who lose a child and neglect their surviving children. It airs Oct. 15 . . . The first returning show of the new season is NBC's "ALF," which starts its third year on Monday.

The Smiths impress fans

By BILL CARR and MICHAEL AIMETTE
Staff Reporters



Rank is the title of The Smiths' second posthumous album, a live recording from the National Ballroom in London in 1986. As expected, the album clearly indicates both sides of The Smiths — the excellent guitar playing of Johnny Marr and the condescending manner of singer Morrissey.

Primarily, The Smiths build their sound on contrasts. The music is colorful, cheery-sounding acoustic/electric rock balanced by Morrissey's depressing lyrics and practically monotone voice. Strangely enough, the combination works, often brilliantly.

Despite Morrissey's pretentiousness, The Smiths shine on this all-digital recording; the songs all have a more aggressive sound than the studio versions. The song selection runs the gamut of The Smith's infamous career, from the self-titled debut ("Still Ill") to Louder Than Bombs ("Is It Really So Strange?) they neglect only to include anything from their last (and worst) album, Strangeways Here We Come. It is certainly a good collection of songs. For those who have not heard The Smiths before, this disc is an excellent sampling of their music. The chosen songs are interesting in that few of them are considered "hits" for the band, yet many of them rank with their best — for instance, "Cemetry Gates" and "London."

Truthfully speaking, it is difficult to recommend this album to those who have not heard The Smiths, since they have a unique sound that people tend to fanatically love or completely loathe. The Smiths were an important band nonetheless, and this live album only reaffirms their standing as one of the best bands of the 1980s.

THE LOW MEN OF CROWDED HOUSE

Crowded House's second album, Temple Of Low Men, reaffirms the fact that this Australian trio is a much-welcome presence on the contemporary pop scene.

The first Crowded House album was a fantastic example of irresistably catchy, yet deceptively intelligent pop. The self-titled album featured a perfect balance of seriousness and fun. Most of the songs were decidedly uptempo, but Crowded House was not afraid to interaperse the raucousness with a ballad here and there.

Temple Of Low Men is not the expected follow-up to Crowded House. The focus on Temple shifts to the ballad, and this change will undoubtedly displease some. Mitchell Froom is again the producer, and he does not change Crowded House's sound that much. The instrumentation, though, seems more sparse this time around.

Temple Of Low Men does not contain a song as obviously catchy as "Don't Dream It's Over" or "Something So Strong," the huge singles off of the first album. True, "Temple" may require more listenings than Crowded House, but take the time to listen. If you fail to, you will be missing out on a very fine album.

Lead vocalist Neil Finn, the ex-Split Enz member, is the driving force of Crowded House; with him the band is in excellent hands. Every songwriting credit on Temple Of Low Men belongs to Finn. The good news is that Neil Finn is one of the best songwriters and singers in the business. Old Split Enz fans already know this. With his new band, though, Finn has refined his talents and shows signs of ever-increasing maturity as a writer. Lyrically, on Temple Of Low Men, he picks up right where he left off on the previous album. Finn has an extraordinary gift for evoking an image, and he rarely falls prey to easy sentimentality, even on his love songs.

Temple Of Low Men will probably not yield the success of Crowded House's debut album; but then, commerciality does not seem to be the band's intent this time around. The focus seems more on exploring new ground. Still, it is a little discouraging to see the dearth of variation and fun on Temple Of Low Men. The real test is to see how the new album affects Crowded House's notably upbeat, light-hearted live performances.

Danielle Steel entertains

By JIM CROSSAN
Staff Reporter

"Everything about her was fabulous. Her essence pervaded every twitching of life my body had to offer. Her eyes were obsessed with her intent, she laid firm in the sand, the sun highlighting her exquisite curves. I could not live without her compassion, her expression, and her love. It took all the courage I had to approach her. I swallowed hard as her blond hair ripped small drops of water down the rounded shoulders. I knelt in the same, shaking in terror beside her, as her beauty engulfed my senses making me shake like the leaves on the trees of fall. 'Hi,' ... it was a simple beginning leaving all pretense behind. 'Excuse me, I'm reading Danielle Steel, was the reply she gave without offering to help gather the pieces of a broken heart."

So the story goes, as women dream of the charming and debonar business man who lifts them off their feet to the shelter of love. Romance novels have not only settled comfortably in the hands of women of all ages, but also have graced the many bestseller shelves around the country. What attracts women to the stories by these prolific authors?

In an attempt to expand limited horizons and enlighten a weak understanding of the female, Steel's Zoya was purchased and read to see if a mere male could comprehend this pinnacle of print with the enthusiasm of the opposite gender. Most men must admit an ignorance to romance novels and to an in depth knowledge of Steel's background.

Zoya Konstantinovna is a 19-year-old woman who lives a lavish life as a close cousin to the Tsar of Russia. Unfortunately, she is living at the time of the October Revolution and the indulgent lifestyle of the Romanov Court is destroyed.

Most men must admit to an ignorance of romance novels and an in-depth knowledge of Steel's background.

She is forced to flee to Paris with her grandmother and a close friend who worked for her family. It is in Paris where the Countess Zoya becomes impoverished at 20, survive off the strength of her iron-clad grandmother, who persists in accepting the heavy blows of fate like Rocky Balboa. Highlighted in his 446-page brochure for tragedy was the incredible, innate strength of Zoya, as well as her grandmother. Steel likes to carefully construct the sculpture of her heroines from the strongest rock while at the same time preserving the beauty of youth, and sensitivity of a fragile heart. Somehow you can become unsure as to the believability of Yoza, and essentially the whole tale itself.

Romance novels are supposed to be enhanced by spectacular characters, exotic senarios, and incredible loves. As always, it is love which allows Zoya to re-enter the aristocratic society that she has fallen out of more than one time.

An enjoyable small taste of romance literature is nice but for most men, it will not be their cup of tea. Steel is a writer who overemphasizes the woman and her strengths, yet at the same time she contains her story in a coherent system of events and leaves the unnecessary "trashy" romance novels to others.

Steel fills this novel with tragedy after tragedy, war after war, (of course in reality these things did happen), but you begin to get the sense that she thinks women are in a constant struggle against love, men, society, and essentially themselves.

In the end, Zora finds solace in her grandaughter Zoy, and a trip to visit St. Petersburg, her original home, away from the pressures of New York, where of course, she has become a success and a beloved member of the rich and famous.

"As I slowly turned to leave this engrossed princess to her book, she called to me. 'I'm sorry for being rude. My name is Samantha Steel. Danielle Steel is my mother, this is her picture right above the line 'America Reads Danielle Steel!' I gave her a look of shock, even horror. I stumbled over an apology for the quick exit, and ran to my towel where a Stephen King thriller lay open. I began to read, hoping to relax, " ... he saw her from afar and thought she was the woman of his dreams, what he did not realize was she was the attraction to a nightmare."

Matt Dillon's acting saves 'Kansas'

By LEONARD ELLIS
Staff Reporter

"Kansas"
David Stephens
Trans World Entertainment
1½

In "Kansas," poor Wade Corey (Andrew McCarthy) with a broken car and nothing of value to pawn, joins gold-toothed and panther-tattooed drifter Doyle Kennedy (Matt Dillon) hitching a free boxcar to Kansas. They stop in a small town, help themselves at a local's house, sample the town's party, rob a bank, and split up as an alarm is tripped.

In the moments following their split, Wade hides the stolen money, rescues the governor's young daughter from the river, and ducks the media following his heroism. A day later he coaxes work as a hand for the farmer father of the girl of his dreams. Meanwhile, Doyle, in various guises, escapes arrest and seeks a reunion with Wade and the money.

"Kansas" is the most recent disaster heaped upon Kansas. Add "Kansas" to the drought and Vice-President George Bush's rejection of U.S. Sen. Robert Dole (R-Ka) as bad for the Jayhawk state. The lone patch of green is Dillon's work. His sociopath rates with James Dean's in "Giant" (1956), and Marlon Brando's in "The Wild One" (1953).

In "Giant," Dean was an insecure brooder with a crush on Elizabeth Taylor. Dean slyly stole the focus of "Giant" from lead Rock Hudson with a quiet, troubled appearance, before flashing and self-destructing. Brando, in "The Wild One," was a rebel motorcycle gang leader who seized the heart of a local girl unaccustomed to brooding dangerous men.

The Dillon evil is a constant threat. He twists stories to appeal to policemen, ex-Marines, carnival operators, and little hookers with big hopes. He chews gum, sights imaginary targets for his gun, and uses other non-verbal gestures with his entire body. Despite Dillon's work, director David Stephen's novice camera work detracts from the performance. For example, when Doyle intimidates Wade at a carnival, the long take shows Doyle's head and the top inch of his shoulders, but leaves his arms and chest out of the picture. It is a huge mistake because Doyle's arms are moving, and the not visible hands may be readying an attack at Wade's neck or face.

A word of career caution to Mr. Dillon. Tough guy leading men often regret that they allowed themselves to be typecast.

A word of career caution to Dillon. Tough guy leading men often regret that they allowed themselves to be typecast. Edward G. Robinson and James Cagney are excellent examples. You are better than both of them. Their wish to do and their skills for comedy, romance or heroism were never fulfilled. You should look for film or stage projects that will ease your transition to the more commercial roles you deserve. If it is only a character part in an "A" movie or a lead in a "B" movie, craft the script to shape your desired versatile image.

McCarthy's performance, even if allowances are made for Dillon's great one, is awful. Hopefully, McCarthy, "Kansas' " bait for its target audience of 12 to 25-year-old females will re-introduce Dillon to a larger audience. Wade would have been a stronger part of his dual identity as hero-robber had darkened his approach to people especially the teenager Lori Bayles (Leslie Hope) he loves. Natives and outsiders have dropped in on Kansas before in movies, most memorably in Joshua Logan's "Picnic" (1956) when native William Holden returned, stole Kim Novak and ran off with her. Wade is too sure in "Kansas" to stoke suspense into the film. And McCarthy's face does not even give us a grin, reminding us of "Mannequin" to distract us from his grim skills.

Naturally, one bad actor does not make a movie bad. "Kansas" is plowed over by an equine-erotic scene when Lori comforts her thunderstorm-stressed horse.

Lori and Wade have an affair. A small town reporter who refuses to explore Wake's dual identity is a huge disservice to the fourth estate and to novelists. The governor's daughter undergoes an improbable separation from her parents. An excited bank clerk urinates during the holdup. Demeaning roles for blacks, one a shoeshine boy and another Bud drinking girl-gazing farm hand. A distracting button-down wardrobe bought wholesale from Mike Dukakis. An ending typical of conventional television. And this ripped off exchange between Doyle and a sexy female carnival operator.

Matt Dillon stars as Doyle Kennedy, an amoral young drifter with a criminal past in "Kansas."

This movie would have been more interesting if Doyle had attracted Lori into a dangerous liaison. Then Dillon could have refreshed us with "The Wild One," which met prevailing language, sex, and violence codes by showing Brando taking the local girl over the sexual edge as she clinched his back during a motorcycle ride. Or with Humphrey Bogart's Duke Mantee in the 1930 "The Petrified Forest" where raw power corrupts waitress Bette Davis in a rural diner at gun point.

Matt Dillon is worth seeing in "Kansas." But see "Kansas" at a matinee and save yourself $2.

throughout the album, while not overstating anything too much.

Erasure demonstrates how varied their album is by including examples of songs with many funky beats that the synthesizers provide. One example of a unique song with such a beat is "Sixty-five Thousand," a tune with no lyrics. The song proves that words are not necessary to get a point across.

Another different, but upbeat song, "Imagination" deals with memories and how your imagination "can change your mind completely." The song is reminiscent of vivid imaginations and how our minds can play tricks on us.

Two extra songs were included on both the cassette and compact disc. "When I Needed You," described as a "melancholic mix" on the album cover, is a sad but beautiful, meaningful song. It repeats these lyrics throughout the song: "Where/ Where were you/ When I needed you most/ When I needed a friend."

"River Deep, Mountain High," another extra, is the only song on the album that was not written by either Clark or Bell. If it was not known that these two songs were extra, it would be impossible to distinguish which tunes were additional and which ones were not.

Stronger Than Pride
Sade
Epic/CBS Records
½

After a three-year absence from the music scene, Sade is back. Her time was well spent preparing her new album in Spain and France, and her true fans will not be disappointed. Best known for hits like "Smooth Operator" and "Sweetest Taboo," Sade's latest release, Stronger Than Pride, is filled with airy and exotic rhythms.

The title track glides from deep, rich harmonies with backing vocalist Leroy Osbourne, to softer, more ethereal notes that only Sade's angelic voice can hit.

The album then kicks into "Paradise," its first single. Due to plenty of airtime on the radio and MTV, "Paradise," with its heavy African groove, was a commercial success. Paul Denham's superior bass line immkediately makes the listener's fingers snap and hips sway.

"Nothing Can Come Between Us," Sade's current single and video now seen on MTV, follows. Sounding like "Sweetest Taboo" with its sleek Brazilian style, it is one of the album's highlights. Once again, Leroy Osbourne's strong and funky back-up perfectly compliments Sade's smooth and steady vocals.

She slows down the pace with "Haunt Me," a rich and earthy tune where the musicians combine piano, violin, and acoustic guitar to produce a delicate blend of music: deep and steady, yet light and gentle enough to be a ballad. Sade's voice carries the listener away with the soft, soothing harmonies that are her trademark.

Side 1 ends on a high note with "Turn My Back On You." Its dark blues sound brings to mind Prince's "Sign O' The Times," and it is definitely a funky, fiery track.

Sade strays only once from the romantic lyrics she is most comfortable with. "Clean Heart" tells the story of a young man caught up in the ugly world of drugs.

Thankfully, the album ends on a positive, funky beat with "Siempre Hay Esperanza (There is Always Hope)," a jazzy, sophisticated number filled with enough saxophone wails and thick percussion to keep listeners dancing and humming long after the album is over.

Clearly, Martin Ditcham's percussion and Denham's bass are the backbone of Stronger Than Pride, which allows Sade to vary her vocal style, drifting from tightly controlled harmonies to loose, flowing emotion. Her band easily combines international influences to produce their own unique, worldly sound that is sure to continue Sade's string of hits. With Stronger Than Pride, Sade proves she keeps getting better with time.

Pure Energy is what explodes from almost every song on the debut album by Information Society. INSOC, as they commonly refer to themselves, is the four-member band stemming from Minneapolis, and recorded by Tommy Boy Music. Information Society is comprised of Paul Robb, who is responsible for most of the synthesizing and drum programming; Kurt Valaquen, also on synthesizer; bassist James Cassidy, and keyboardist Amanda Kramer. The combination of their computerized sounds is what draws them attention.

The "Software" or first side of the album begins with their present hit "What's on Your Mind." A good way to start off with INSOC's distinctive drum blasts that can make anyone dance. This same general beat continues through the next two songs into "Repetition," where the speed of the drums just gets turned down a few notches. Listening carefully, one can detect some famous lines from Star Trek mixed in with the synthesizing.

INSOC really gets into the "Hardware" on Side 2, where we still hear their continuous drum beat, but this time in preparation for more intense dance purposes. Listening to "Over the Sea," traces can be found of new Depeche Mode-type dance music. The likeness between the voices of INSOC's Kurt Valaquen and Depeche's Martin Gore might cause distraction, but the distinction clears up as the songs continue.

"Attitude" includes more Leonard Nimoy mixes, but it is the drums once again that give the atmosphere of tough guys strutting down the street. Adding to this is the computerized sound of steel knives clashing.

What all these songs lead to is the high level of technological percussion in "Running." It is easily the most synthesized song on the album, which is probably why it is so popular in dance clubs and as a back up mix for other songs. The totally electronic interlude does not allow for a moment of rest, only high energy be-bopping. This is INSOC's trademark.

Their innovative computerization and synthesizing techniques are what makes this new album by Information Society a dance dub smash.

Women's Soccer

Troubled times continued for the women's varsity soccer team as the ECAC defending champions were shut out twice this weekend. On Sept. 24, the team travelled to the University of Virginia to meet the Cavaliers, ranked eighth in the nation at the time.

Starting goalie Karen Del Sarto was sidelined because of an injury sustained earlier in the week, but junior Christy McGaha was dazzling in front of the net. McGaha bravely faced a blistering attack from the Virginia offense, denying 22 out of 24 shots taken on the Villanova goal during regulation play.

Scoring with 18:49 left in the second half, the Cavaliers drew first blood and never looked back, adding another goal at the 36:45 mark. A disappointing Villanova offense managed to attempt only six shots on goal and failed to score on all of them. The 2-0 loss to Virginia brought the Cats' overall record to 0-4-2.

Hoping to get back on track, the squad faced William & Mary on Sept. 25. The Tribe, ranked seventh in the nation, jumped to an early lead, scoring with 15:48 remaining in the first half.

The exhausted Villanova offense managed to attempt six shots on goal, but could not capitalize on their opportunities. Controlling the ball, William & Mary was able to score two more times with less than two minutes left in the second period, resulting in a 3-0 'Nova defeat.

The Wildcats' brutal five-game road trip will continue on Sept. 29 when they travel to the University of Maryland.

Volleyball falls

By MONICA BYRNE
Staff Reporter

Willie Nelson's song, "On the Road Again," is certainly an appropriate theme for the women's volleyball team. 'Nova has just completed its 10th road match and will continue to compete on foreign ground for about a month.

Is this a problem? According to Coach Dave Barkley, it certainly is. "We're hurt by being on the road every weekend."

The 'Cats traveled to Penn State for a tournament, on Sept. 23, only to return empty handed. 'Nova took the court against Memphis State, but were defeated in three games, (7-15, 8-15, 3-15). Coach Barkley felt his team was "very flat" for this match.

Looking to beat nationally-ranked Penn State, 'Nova rose to the level of the competition. Despite playing very well, the Cats fell prey to the Nittany Lions (2-15, 4-15, 5-15).

For their third match of the weekend, the spikers met Maryland, but suffered a disappointing (6-15, 8-15, 12-15) loss. Hillary Anderson tallied six aces, but 'Nova was once again plagued by inconsistency.

Coach Barkley insists that his team has "not stopped working" and is truly "improving" despite the fact that his players have not had any spectator support on account of their traveling. He feels that his team is "streaking instead of graphing points evenly."

Next on 'Nova's agenda are single matches against Georgetown, Maryland and LaSalle, as well as the Big Five Tournament, which Coach Barkley feels "is in [his team's] grasp." Consistency is the key word for future success of the Lady 'Cats.

Men's crew glides to victory in Pa. tourney

By JIM BOWMAN
Features Editor

For the Villanova men's crew team, a summer of intense physical conditioning and three hard weeks of training in early September did not take long to pay dividends.

In their first competition of the 1988-89 campaign, 'Nova's varsity lightweight-eight team raced to the title in the prestigious "Head of the Ohio" regatta in Pittsburgh, Pa., Sept. 24.

Despite competition from such schools as Cornell, who row out of the powerful Ivy League Conference, and Notre Dame, the Wildcats breezed to victory, as the field felt the heat of the "big blue storm."

Their time of 12:54 was eight seconds ahead of Notre Dame and 11 seconds ahead of Cornell. According to sophomore Bill McKernan, the victory should be only the beginning of a very successful year.

"We should be a lot better than last year. Kids came back with a better attitude, in a lot better shape. This win should set the tone for a good year. It shows we have an up-and-coming program," said McKernan.

Sophomore Greg Stefan agreed with the importance of conditioning, adding, "We came back [from summer] in better shape than any other team in the race. I thought we would win and I was very pleased when we did. I really have to credit our coach, Jack St. Clair, for our success."

St. Clair, in his second year as head coach of the team, set a training regimen for the team before the summer and told the players they had to return in excellent shape or else. The players complied, and in their first competition of the season, they defeated an Ivy League boat for the first time and rowed one of their best races in years.

Competing in Villanova's eight-man boat in the "Head of the Ohio" were: bow, Greg Doyle; two seat, Dennis Chiapettia; three seat, Victor Galic; four seat, Greg Stefan; six seat, Joe Barrow; seven seat, Al Stefan; stroke. Bill McKernan; and coxswain, Gerry Gleeson.

With a wealth of talented freshmen joining crew this season and renewed confidence in the program, the rowers now believe they can establish crew as a sport to be reckoned with at Villanova.

"This win was just the first step," commented McKernan. "We could have a real good year and we want people at 'Nova to look at us and see a great program."

Ruggers trample Owls

By JOHN R. LEARY and CARLO DiNOTA
Staff Reporters

The Villanova Rugby Club opened its conference schedule with a hard-fought victory over Temple at the Cecil B. Moore Field in Philadelphia. Villanova, the defending Eastern Pennsylvania Collegiate Champions, who are currently ranked tenth in the East Coast by Rugby Magazine, responded to an early deficit in the first half by scoring 14 unanswered points.

Villanova scored their first three points on Mike Koons' penalty kick. The Nova Ruggers then remained scoreless until their second half surge.

The next two tries were supplied by prop, Rick Clairmont, and lock, Bruce Rounsaville, on two relentless forward drives inside Temple's five-meter line.

Villanova sealed its victory on a perfectly executed play by Steve Condi, who before receiving a hit by four Temple defenders, tossed the ball to a streaking Joe McGrady. McGrady sprinted 60 meters for a score, much to the pleasure of a partisan 'Nova crowd.

Captain Brian Coughlin summed up the day's events, stating, "I was satisfied with the win, but we still have a few kinks to work out before we reach championship form."

The B-team continued Villanova's domination of the day by trouncing Temple, reaffirming 'Nova's claim that their B's can run with any other squad's starting side. The scoring was supplied by Bill Sicord, Scott King and Marty Sambora.

The day was capped off with a third game between Villanova's young C-side and a newly formed Johns Hopkins club. Villanova was victorious once again, and the future of the rugby program seemingly rests in good hands.

The rubgy team will face league rival Drexel on Oct. 1 at 11:30 a.m. in its first home game of the year at the Morris Estates.

attempted to maul the referee. When asked why he acted so rashly, the guard answered, "He (the Korean) should have won." Is that classy or what?

Much of this controversy in boxing has come as a result of suspect officiating. Both the inconsistency and incompetence that have been the trademarks of these officials have caused much of the unrest.

Though a certain amount of subjectivity is unavoidable, some grounds for objectivity must be established to provide the needed consistency.

Speaking about consistency, how about the East German women's gymnastics judge who is about as consistent with her rulings as the Phillies are with winning. She nailed the United States on a meaningless rules infraction because a gymnast remained on the platform while another was performing a routine.

The purpose of this rule is to prevent coaches from interfering with the athletes. In this case, however, it was blatantly obvious that there was no coaching going on. This deduction cost the United States the bronze medal. Instead, these women went home empty handed.

Shortly thereafter, the same judge allowed a gymnast from Israel to switch her assigned performance time from the morning to the already filled evening schedule because of religious reasons. Last minute changes of this sort are not supposed to be technically allowed.

Is it fair that this judge was willing to bend the rules for this girl only a day after she "stole" a medal from the American team? I wonder if her and the Korean security guard know each other.

The incident that has received the most ink as of late, however, involves Canadian track star Ben Johnson. He was stripped of the gold medal he won in the 100 meter because of steroid use that was detected in a random drug test.

Let us just hope that this unfortunate occurrence will prompt some serious action by athletes, coaches and governments regarding this troubling problem.

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is Olympic athlete, Vicki Huber.

Huber surpassed most expectations, along with most of the field, and placed sixth in the 3000-meter race in Seoul. Huber took the lead from renowned runner Mary Slaney with three laps remaining, and the eyes of the world were focused on her.

Huber eventually finished with a time of 8:37.25, a personal best. This time was good enough to make her the sixth best 3000-meter runner in the world, and the best in the United States on that day.

Men's Tennis bounces back with fifth place in tourney

By STEVE KIRSCH
Staff Reporter

The 'Nova men's tennis team rebounded from a disappointing Big East Tournament and came up with a strong performance at the ECAC Tournament in Lawrenceville, NJ, on Sept. 23-24. The final standings indicate a much better showing for the Wildcat netters as they finished a very respectable third with 19 team points.

They trailed only Towson State with 20 and Concordia with 19.5. Behind 'Nova's 19 was Lafayette with 16 and Monmouth with 15 to round out the top five.

There were 23 teams participating in this highly competitive tournament and the Wildcat men were seeking an improvement over their fifth-place finish at the Big East tourney in Rhode Island. The Cats are now hoping to work towards the spring of '89.

Villanova's No. 1 seed, senior Mike Rouse, returned to form and swept through his bracket to win the No. 1 singles championship.

After a first-round bye, Rouse, a Haverford product, defeated Joe DeMenne of Upsala, 6-3, 6-0. He soundly whipped Joti Baldrich of Mount St. Mary's, 6-1, 6-2 in the quarterfinals and Danny Narizzano of New York University, 6-0, 6-2 in the semifinals to reach the final contest.

Rouse, looking to get 'Nova off to a flying start, came back from a set down to defeat Ricardo Pereira of Concordia, 1-6, 6-4, 6-4. Rouse had only managed to win one of his three matches at the Big East Tournament.

Taylor Teresi, a junior from Tonawonda, NY, also made a fine showing by reaching the finals of the No. 2 seeding bracket. Following his first-round bye, Teresi edged Charlie Bowers of Lafayette, 6-4, 7-6. Teresi then faced Andreas Kuuhn of St. Joseph's and won, 6-3, 3-0 as Kuuhn retired due to injury.

Teresi had no problems in reaching the final of his bracket as he thrashed Adam Kramson of Rider, 6-2, 6-3 in the semis. However, he lost a tight match in the final to Tony Bueno of Concordia, 6-4, 7-5.

The No. 3 singles seed, sophomore Mike Loughman, met with stiff competition after his first-round bye and was tripped up in the second round by Gary Taylor of Mount St. Mary's, 6-4, 6-4.

Freshman Steve Forrest, after a successful debut at the Big East tourney two weeks ago, continued his winning ways in his first round match at No. 4 singles. He easily defeated Lou LaForgia of Seton Hall, 6-0, 6-0. Forrest followed up the "double bagel" by winning both his second-round match and his quarterfinal match by scores of 6-3, 6-2 and 6-2, 4-6, 6-3, respectively.

Forrest was eliminated in the semifinals by Torrey Dorsey of Towson State, 6-1, 6-4, but he has proven that he will be a valuable addition to the '88-'89 Wildcat squad.

Representing 'Nova tennis in the doubles competition was the pair of senior Greg Ackerman and junior John O'Dwyer, normally the No. 3 doubles duo. Ackerman and O'Dwyer opened up with a 6-4, 6-2 victory against Bob Burket and Eric Grainger of Mount St. Mary's.

In their second round match, they had little trouble disposing of John Kennedy and Sean Aamenon of Concordia, 6-3, 6-2.

Ackerman and O'Dwyer were knocked off by Lafayette's Dave Rubin and Phil Manyer, 6-4, 4-6, 6-3 in a tight quarterfinal match. But the impressive play of the pair topped off a resounding comeback by the entire team from the struggles of the previous weekend.

Coach Dr. Robert Langran hopes that this success will carry over into the Cats regular season this spring.

Field Hockey offense outsmarts opponents

By AMY C. SPENCER
Assistant Sports Editor

Villanova field hockey had a banner week in which they cruised to three straight victories, including a 2-1 overtime win over 12th-ranked University of Connecticut. This ended their streak of five games without a win.

Senior goaltender Mary Monahan led the Cats to shutout victories over Hofstra, 3-0, on Sept. 21, and Georgetown 4-0, on Sept. 24. These were the 15th and 16th shutouts of her Villanova career, which set a new all-time school record.

This was Monahan's second record, as she recorded the most shutouts in a season last year with 10. This season, she anchors the Wildcat defense with a .992 save percentage and 119 saves to date.

The winning streak began when the Cats faced Hofstra. Villanova took the lead on a first period score by forward Sharon Seiz.

Hofstra never had a chance as Ann Dickey scored twice in the second period to make the score 3-0. 'Nova's defense controlled the ball well, as they limited Hofstra to 12 shots on goal the entire game.

Not only an alert defense, but also a smart offense has contributed to the Cats recent turnaround, according to Head Coach Cheryl Massaro. "We've been making a wiser selection of shots which has helped us tremendously," she said. "The forwards, instead of just hammering the goalkeeper, are waiting until the best times to shoot, and therefore, we're getting a much better shot on goal than in previous games.

The winning ways continued on September 24, in the first period on a long shot by Seiz. Seiz, Dickey and Tory Rife each knocked one in during the second period to clinch the win. The defense remained on top of their game as the Wildcats held the Hoyas to nine tried shots, while attempting 45.

Sundays game was a true test of the player's abilities as they faced the 12th-ranked UConn team. Villanova took the initiative and scored first on a goal by Rife with three minutes left in the first period.

UConn pulled even halfway through the second period, and regulation play ended with the score 1-1.

Both teams played well during the overtime period, but Jen Peacock came through with the winning goal for the Cats.

We're a very strong team and we have to intimidate and dominate to be successful.
-Field Hockey Coach Cheryl Massaro

Massaro was pleased with the upset victory, but declared that she expected it. "I feel that Villanova's squad plays to the level of their competition. So when we play very good teams, we play very good and we're capable of winning. We're a very strong team and we have to intimidate and dominate to be successful."

Golf team improves

By BRUCE ALBANESE

The Wildcat golf team made yet another valiant effort at victory during the two-day Franklin and Marshall Invitational in Lancaster, Pa. on Sept. 17 and 18. However, the results were similar to the opening tournament of the season, as the Cats finished a dismal 17th.

Fifth-year senior John Marcantognini manifested his leadership and experience by carrying the team with a two-day aggregate score of 159 (80-79). No. 1 man, Jeff Osler, and No. 2 man, Kevin Rogerson, both shot 36-hole totals of 161 to assist the Cats' team score and save them from total embarrassment.

Coach Don Ficco was unavailable for comment, but Jeff Osler, a native of Hilton Head, S.C., summed up the disastrous weekend by remarking, "Everybody just played really poorly. Nobody could get anything together."

Osler also noted that the team has suffered a few injuries, with two of the top five going down early in the season, one with a broken index finger and another with a chronic back problem involving the lower vertebrae.

This forced Coach Ficco into playing different people each week at the number four and five spots, which is just another factor contributing to the demise of the Cats.

Osler was quick to point out that the course was in horrendous shape, as four of the 18 holes were being completely re-sodded. This meant that receiving a good lie in the fairway was difficult.

To compound this problem, the golfers found the pin placements tucked behind sand traps and the tee markers at the very backs of the trees.

Putting the bad news aside, the Cats do have some hope to shine next week as they play in the competitive St. John's tournament. The following week they will travel to Maryland to play in the Big East Tournament — a tournament the Cats have been preparing for all year long.

"Seton Hall is struggling this year, and we came in second last year, so our chances are very good to win the Big East," Osler said.

Women's tennis team aces Big East rival

The women's tennis team powered their way to the team title at the P.A.I.A.W. tennis tournament held on Sept. 18 at Villanova. Since then, the Wildcats have continued their winning ways by establishing a four-match winning streak.

The winning streak commenced with a shut-out victory against Swarthmore which was followed by victories over Monmouth, Rider and Seton Hall. "Seton Hall was an especially exciting victory for the team since Seton Hall is a member of the Big East," boasted team captain, Laura Smelas, "(and) we are extremely happy and pleased with our performance."

The Wildcats certainly have a lot to be proud of since the team lost to Seton Hall last year. According to Coach Langran, the Wildcat win can also be attributed to a lucky break, "Seton Hall's strongest player was hurt and this helped our win."

Following the four-match winning streak, the Wildcats fell to Fordham, but quickly bounced back to their winning form, defeating yet another Big East team, St. John's. According to Coach Langran, "The match against Fordham was extremely close."

Clinching two strong victories over Big East teams and back on a winning streak, the Wildcats appear a little less tense with the season half over. "The team has given a very respectable showing, but right now we are very tired from the road trip and playing so many strong teams consecutively without a break," commented Smelas.

The Wildcats, though, eagerly anticipate playing Delaware followed by Washington College in Maryland. "Delaware is a strong team and it is going to be a tough match," Langran said. "However, we beat Washington last year, so hopefully we'll be able to do it once again."

Cats claw past Terriers in OT, 31-24

By JOHN G. RICCO
Sports Editor

The Villanova Wildcats made their Yankee Conference debut last Saturday in a way which typifies the team Head Coach Andy Talley has built over the last four years. The visiting Cats grabbed a 31-24 overtime victory from Boston U. in a contest sprinkled with high-flying offense several big plays, and a solid defensive effort thrown in for good measure.

"I think this game was great for Yankee Conference football," said B.U. Head Coach Chris Palmer.

The Wildcats looked to have victory in hand when sophomore Tom Withka booted a 20-field goal for a 24-14 'Nova lead with just 7:35 left in the contest. The Terrier offense had not scored since late in the first quarter and the V.U. defense was playing well.

B.U., however, rallied for 10 points in the final four minutes to the delight of their 5,153 fans and sent the two clubs into overtime.

The game-tying touchdown came when a pass from B.U. quarterback Jim Schuman was deflected into the hands of receiver Darvell Huffman, who ran untouched 49 yards for the score.

In the Yankee Conference, overtime is run in a way similar to extra innings in baseball. Each team has an opportunity to score from its opponent's 25-yard line.

If, after both possessions, there is no score or the score is tied, There will be a second overtime period. This will continue until one team has a lead after an equal number of possessions. This team is then declared the winner.

Boston University won the coin toss and chose to defend, thus the Wildcats started at the Terriers' 25.

The Cats moved in as close as the B.U. three-yard line, but a fumbled snap by quarterback Kirk Schulz resulted in a subsequent seven-yard loss. One incomplete pass later, 'Nova set up for an apparent go-ahead field goal.

Senior Bob Brady, in as the holder, took the snap, however, and threw a 10-yard touchdown pass to senior tight end Richard Lage. Withka added the point after and the Cats were up 31-24.

"I felt at that point I didn't want to see two or three possessions," said Talley. "I wanted to get it in the end zone right away."

B.U.'s attempt to tie was then stopped in dramatic fashion. On a fourth and one at Villanova's 16, linebacker Mickey Watson made a big hit on running back Jay Hillman, stopping him cold and giving 'Nova the win.

Watson, who finished with an unprecedented nine unassisted tackles, led a defensive unit which earned much praise from Talley. "It was a great effort by our defense. They've been maligned lately and they felt they had something to prove.

"They showed they had enough guts and character to get it done in overtime."

Offensively, the Cats were equally impressive, piling up 447 total offensive yards against a highly respected Terrier defense. Schulz finished the day 24-40 for 247 yards and tossed TD passes to Brady and flanker Ron Sency.

Fullback Pete Lombardi also had a big day, rushing for 110 yards and one touchdown on 25 carries.

'Nova continues its Yankee Conference schedule this Saturday against Rhode Island at Villanova Stadium. Though the Rams (2-2) were beaten by B.U. 41-16 earlier this season, Talley is not taking them lightly.

"We are very concerned about Rhode Island," he said. "They have talent and their program has a lot of tradition and pride. Right now this is the biggest game of the year for us. We want to show that we're not a flash in the pan."

Cats Notes:

—Watson's defensive heroics earned him Yankee Conference Co-Defensive Player of the Week. He shares the honor with University of Connecticut cornerback Rusty Neal.

—Villanova set a new team record for first downs with 33 against the Terriers. The old mark of 29 was set in 1986 in the Wildcats' 40-6 win over Iona.

—With his 20-yard field goal, Withka upped his career mark to an impressive 10 made in 13 attempts. After a 4-4 on PATs he is now 41-42.

Huber cashes in on dream

By DOUG SCANCARELLA
Sports Editor

When Vicki Huber was invited to try to qualify for the 1988 Summer Olympics, Villanovans everywhere were ecstatic. It was a great honor for Huber and Villanova.

She bettered that feat by qualifying for the games and in turn bettered that by qualifying for the finals with a time of 8:47.25 last Friday in Seoul, South Korea.

Could Huber possibly do anymore? Could she make Villanovans any prouder?

The answer was yes. Huber, a senior at Villanova, finished sixth in a field of 15 in the Olympic finals of the 3000-meter race. Her time of 8:37.25, a personal best, made her the first U.S. runner to cross the finish line.

"Vicki is a very emotional person, but I have never seen her this happy. She let it all out and she deserved to. She represented Villanova very well. Everybody at Villanova should be proud of her, she brought great honor to the school. Her performance is one of the brightest moments in Villanova athletics history. It was something I will never forget. I am very proud of her," Villanova women's track coach and Huber's personal coach Marty Stern said.

Stern has a right to be proud, as do Villanova alumni, students and faculty. Huber defeated many talented athletes, former medalists and world champions. One such athlete was the USA's Mary Slaney.

Slaney had led for the first half of the race, but Huber passed her on the outside with about three laps to go.

"I had the decision to pass Mary or not," Huber said. "I decided to pass her because I had it in me and I figured I may never have the chance again."

Huber held the lead for just under two laps, but began to fade. She eventually finished sixth. "It was an effort to finish, but I have always told myself I would never quit," Huber said.

"I am very pleased with Vicki's performance," Stern said, "I told her to run her race. We were training for her to run under 8:40.0 and she did. It was quite a job."

The winner of the race, Taniana Somolenko of the Soviet Union recorded a time of 8:26.53, a new Olympic record. Slaney finished a distant 10th with a time of 8:47.15, while fellow American, Pattisue Plumer finished 13th.

Vicki represented Villanova very well. Everybody at Villanova should be proud of her, she brought great honor to the school.
Women's Track Coach Marty Stern

What's next for Huber? The possibilities are limitless.

It certainly appears she will be a favorite in the 1992 Olympics in Barcelona, Spain. Before that, however, she has her senior season at Villanova to look forward to, a season that will mark the end of a brilliant collegiate career.

"Vicki went half way around the world and represented Villanova very well. She definitely established herself as a top prospect for 1992," Stern concluded.

At the risk of beating a topic to death, "On the Ball" will once more discuss the Olympics. After all, they will not happen again until 1992. Ever hear of a blessing in disguise?

The theatrics, along with the athletics, are reaching new heights in Seoul. To my surprise, however, the main points of controversy have been generated from the actual games themselves and not from the political instability of the host nation.

To sum it up, South Korea has served as a more than appropriate host thus far.

Boxing, a sport that needs no introduction to the world of theater, has continued to be a focal point of the games for the wrong reasons.

This ongoing epic has taken the form of a tragicomedy. It was highlighted by a mini-riot that broke out in the ring when a Korean boxer was defeated.

The symbol, however, that sums up this incident only too well involved the Korean security guard who was stationed ringside.

He took matters into his own hands along with the Korean coaches as they collectively

University divested from South Africa

By KEVIN C. HEIL
Assistant News Editor

Villanova University has completely divested from South Africa, the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, said last week.

Dobbin said that Edward J. Caughlin III, chairman of the investment committee of the Board of Trustees, recently assured him that "this motion [divestment] has been fully complied with."

The decision to divest was made at the April 14, 1987 meeting of the Board of Trustees, when the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., was University president, according to Dobbin.

"The Board members moved that the University divest of all securities in companies doing business in South Africa by December 1987," said Dobbin, a member of the Board of Trustees at that time. The Board approved the resolution.

He said it is not easy to immediately divest because "stocks have to be sold ... there's a whole period of sorting them out ... and sometimes they're not easy to locate. It's not always easy to know whether a company has subsidiaries in South Africa.

We had no knowledge we were in South Africa. We were simply investing, like most other universities, in various companies.
The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin O.S.A. University president

"There are moral arguments on both sides [as to] whether divestiture is the best strategy to accomplish social justice in South Africa. The University had to opt for one side or the other. Obviously, in this resolution, the University opted to divest," he explained.

"We never invested in South Africa as a principle," Dobbin said. "We had no knowledge that we were in South Africa. We were simply investing, like most other universities, in the various companies.

"It's not as if universities had anything to do with South Africa at all. You were investing in what were mostly American companies, and these companies, even though you didn't know it, [happened] to have subsidiaries in South Africa," he explained.

Policy on harassment may be implemented soon

By JENNIFER REIDY
Assistant News Editor

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, said last week he will present a defined sexual harassment policy to the Board of Trustees for approval on Oct. 11.

If approved, Dobbin said he will also request that the policy be implemented immediately. "I don't want to predict the action of the Board, but I don't see that there would be any problem," he said.

A University committee on sexual harassment had originally created a proposed policy in 1986 and had submitted it to the University's law firm of Morgan, Lewis and Bockius. "After two years, the policy is finally back from the lawyers," Dr. Mary Desmond, biology professor and committee member, said.

"I don't know anyone around here who wouldn't want a sexual harassment policy. The delay was strictly due to legal counsel," Dobbin explained.

Dobbin met with the committee last week to discuss the proposed policy and the issue of sexual harassment. "Fr. Dobbin was extremely open and accommodating, and most impressively, he was familiar with our [the committee's] work and was very prepared," Desmond commented.

Dr. John Immerwahr, philosophy professor and chairman of the sexual harassment committee.

"After a period of incredible frustration with this issue, Fr. Dobbin has taken a strong, active and positive position. The policy was stalled for years, and we ought to have had one a long time ago," Dr. John Immerwahr, philosophy professor and chairman of the committee, commented.

"A policy is a necessity legally and morally. Fr. Dobbin is not simply riding along with this issue — he's a leader and he understands its importance," he concluded.

"We did not have to present an argument to Dobbin as to why the lack of sexual harassment policy at Villanova was a problem, as we had to in past years," Desmond added.

"He [Dobbin] has cut through a lot of red tape. More has happened in 20 minutes than has happened in the last five years [with the policy]," she said.

Dobbin will present the policy to the executive committee of the Board of Trustees, which decides

Dobbin inaugurated with ceremony

By ELLIOT A. FUS

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., 31st president of the University, described his vision of Villanova in a speech during his inauguration on Oct. 5 in the duPont Pavilion.

Representatives from more than 130 colleges and universities attended.

The presidents of 27 local schools, including Temple, St. Joseph's, La Salle, Drexel Universities and Bryn Mawr College, were among over 160 academic representatives. Also joining them were members of learned and professional organizations, such as the American Bar Association, American Nurses' Association and the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities, government officials, students, faculty and trustees.

Dobbin, a 52-year-old theologian, succeeds the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president for the past 13 years. Dobbin was chosen in June and assumed the office Sept. 1.

The exercises were initiated with a vivid traditional academic procession which began at about 3 p.m. Visiting academic representatives marched from Bartley Hall to the pavilion, where they were joined by other dignitaries.

After entering the building, the inaugural procession filled the floor in a colorful display of formal academic garb. A special platform party consisting of deans, speakers and other officials took its place on stage.

Decoration and music magnified the formal ambience of the event. The stage was decorated with flower arrangements and greeneries and the perimeter of the bleachers was fringed in blue and white. Music was provided by the University band, the Villanova Singers, the Glee Club and gospel singers.

Student voters may face obstacles

By MAUREEN STAPLETON
Staff Reporter

Delaware County officials' statements that students who change their voter registration to this county will be jeopardizing their student and has been challenged.

Margaret Boyd, the director of voter registration for Delaware County, said Oct. 4, "If students change their address on voter registration, then they have to cancel their aid. If they're getting aid from back home, then they have to register there."

Jack Gallagher, an attorney in Media, said Oct. 5, "It's highly improbable that such a law would exist. It would surprise me if it did."

"There is not great clarity on the issue. Students do it all the time ... this ploy has been used for years by the local board of elections. There isn't any case law that states registering to vote would change residency," said Michael Burke, an aide to Rep. Peter Kostmayer, Oct. 4.

Francis Conners, solicitor for Delaware County, disagrees. He said Oct. 5 that voter registration establishes legal residence and a change of address would jeopardize any future aid given by a student's home state.

Boyd said, "In our contact with some students, they have had to cancel aid ... technically, the student is no longer a resident of their home state [when they change their registration].

Gallagher questioned why students would return to Boyd to tell her that they had lost their aid because of registering to vote.

Dr. Joseph DesJardins, a philosophy professor with the Center for Peace and Justice Education, recently cited other examples of problems that students have encountered in Delaware County. One of the examples he gave was the use of voter registration lists by zoning officials to check on the number of occupants living in one house.

He said, "Students are taking a chance by registering to vote ... there's a very explicit threat [that the zoning officials will go after them].

Gallagher said that if zoning officials are using the information garnered by the registration, "it sounds like there is a violation of civil rights there."

DesJardins also cited cases

Sexual assault case settled

By JENNIFER REIDY
Assistant News Editor

A lawsuit between a former Villanova student and the University concerning an alleged sexual assault in a dormitory room was settled out of court this summer, according to an article in the July 16 issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer.

The University agreed to pay the student, a woman, $20,000 in settlement. The woman had originally sued the school for $250,000.

The woman will receive an additional $15,000 from the two men, also former students, who were accused of molesting the woman, the Inquirer reported.

According to the lawsuit, a male student, Mark Tully, ascended an outdoor fire escape and entered a propped-open door on the second floor of a women's dormitory. He then allegedly entered the unlocked room of the sleeping sophomore and molested her, reported the article.

Tully said he thought the woman was willing to have sex with him, the article continued. He admitted to climbing the fire escape, entering the room, taking off most of his clothes and kissing her legs, the Inquirer noted.

The woman filed the lawsuit against Tully and the University last fall, according to the article.

The woman based her case against the University on accusations of negligence for failing to provide adequate security.

The University then sued Dennis O'Toole, a former Villanova student, whom Tully said "had bragged that he had just had sex with the woman and told Tully that she would 'fool around' with him, too," the article said.

O'Toole denied the allegations, the Inquirer said.

Tully was suspended from Villanova for one semester after the incident, the article reported.

Chief Rowan P. Kelly, director of Security, said Tuesday that "this is not a rape case."

He added, "It's disgusting. If anyone around here fell into a hole, they would say that Security was negligent for not reporting the hole."

Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, said, "It happened, it was unfortunate and the University responded to the case by taking measures against the male student. However, the judicial process was responsible for determining what happened beyond that, and that will apparently never be decided."

Directory may be out by Nov.

By LYNNAE BOROWSKI

The student directory is scheduled to be distributed the week before Thanksgiving break, approximately two weeks earlier than last year's, said Christine Wnuk, editor of the directory.

"We're really excited about it — we're going to beat last year's by two weeks," said Student Government president-elect John Lewis.

The directory will contain names, addresses and phone numbers of students living on and off campus. Home addresses will also be listed. In addition, the directory will include a listing of the University staff, professors, administrators and their offices, said Wnuk.

The directory also will contain residence hall phone numbers, while last year's did not, added Wnuk.

This year's directory may also contain train and bus schedules, academic calendars, a table of contents, abbreviation codes and emergency numbers, if there is enough space in the directory, said Wnuk.

Wnuk said that the directory contains the same number of yellow pages as last year's book.

Wnuk also said that this year's directory contains between 8,000 and 10,000 names, 5,000 more names than last year's directory held.

Last year listings were acquired through students' mailed responses. However, "this year we reinterpreted the law and everyone is in it, except those who came to the Registrar's office and specified they didn't want [to be] in," explained Wnuk.

University Directories, a company in North Carolina, is publishing the directory for the third consecutive year, said Wnuk. The company is also in charge of the advertisements for the directory.

The only assistance Wnuk had was from the Registrar's office.

Bond lectures

By SINEAD QUINN
Staff Reporter

Civil rights activist Julian Bond reflected on the movement he has helped to lead during a lecture in Bartley Hall Oct. 4.

Bond was the first in a series of speakers connected to the Honors program seminar, "The 1960s: Politics and Culture." The lecture was attended by 100 people.

The format included introductions by Dr. Michael E. Burke, director of the Honors program, and Robert Pigeon of the history department, the seminar's professor who is responsible for the series of speakers.

Pigeon introduced Bond by describing his resume of political activity, which includes being managing editor of The Atlanta Inquirer and serving 20 years as a member of the George legislature with eight years in the House and 12 in the State Senate. He also has served as chairman of the NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People) and co-founder of SNCC, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Coalition.

Bond is presently teaching a course at Drexel University on the history of the civil rights movement.

Bond began his lecture by explaining his own beginnings in his quest for civil rights. He described an environment that slowly forced the suppressed minorities to fight for justice.

He stressed that the civil rights movement came to being not by some explosive force but by the slow determination of people who saw that it was time for a change. The people who were a part of the early civil rights movement were not destined from birth to lead people against racial injustice. Rather, they were ones like himself who were hesitant at first but grew in their convictions, he said.

Bond proceeded to recount the beginnings of SNCC. He described situations where he and a small group of others would hold impromtu demonstrations.

"If we went into a restaurant, asked to be served and were refused, we'd hold a demonstration — not necessarily a formal one, but we would let it be known

Correction

There was an error in the article, "Initial Senate Meeting Today," which appeared in the Sept. 23 issue of the Villanovan. The article stated that the [requirement changes for senators who are transfer students] is a constitutional one, so the issue must be decided by the senators.

In fact, after this decision has been made by the Senate, it must be decided by the Board of Trustees. This is stated in Article IX, section 2 of the Constitution of the University Senate. The Villanovan apologizes for the error.

Tardy singers disrupt concert

By KATHRYN QUIGLEY
Entertainment Editor

The Parents' Weekend concert of Oct. 1 at the duPont Pavilion featuring the Four Tops and the Spinners was marked by logistical problems and delays.

As a result, the contract of the Spinners was renegotiated and they were paid half of the original fee, said Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities.

The original plan was for the Spinners to take the stage at 8 p.m., according to Gorski. Then, after a few minutes "turnaround" time, the Four Tops would go on around 9:30 p.m. "They would end at 10:45 p.m.-11 p.m. at the latest," said Gorski.

At about 5:30 p.m., the Spinners' manager called to say that a member of the group, John Edwards, had missed his plane in Miami. He would not be able to arrive in Philadelphia until 9:30 p.m.

Gorski then had to negotiate with the Four Tops, so that they would appear first. However, this was "a big ego thing. The Four Tops feel that they are the bigger band and should go last," Gorski said.

The Four Tops did agree to open the concert, but there was one drawback — a member of their group, Levi Stubbs, had also missed a plane and would not arrive until 8 p.m.

"That would've been fine if they'd gone on at 9:30 p.m., like we had originally planned," said Gorski.

In the meantime, the other three members of the Four Tops had gotten lost on the way to Villanova from their hotel in Malvern. Their limousine driver was based in Atlantic City and was unfamiliar with the area. Thus, the other three members of the Four Tops did not arrive until 8:45 p.m., said Gorski.

The crowd of parents and students had been waiting for almost an hour, so as soon as all the members of the Four Tops arrived, they went on stage. From 9 p.m. to after 10 p.m., they performed their hits, including "It's The Same Old Song," and "Baby I Need Your Loving."

After their set, an announcement was made that both bands were experiencing technical difficulties, but the show would continue in a few minutes. Some of the parents and students left at this point, but most stayed.

In the meantime, Gorski had learned that Edwards' plane, scheduled to land at 9:30 p.m., would not arrive in Philadelphia until 10 p.m. This meant that the second half was delayed even more.

By 11 p.m., the audience was starting to trickle out. A few began to boo. The Spinners' orchestra took the stage soon after and played several instrumental songs. A member of the Spinners entourage then took the stage and announced that Edwards' plane had just landed.

"Hearing this, about 85% of the audience left, and I can't really blame them," said Gorski. However, as most were leaving, Edwards' limousine was pulling into the parking lot of the duPont Pavilion.

Gorski told the band to take the stage immediately, although Edwards intended to change into

Professor speaks on world market

By
MICHAEL G. BELLOPEDE
Staff Reporter

Dr. Jan Prybyla, a Penn State University professor and economic systems expert, lectured Sept. 27 on economic issues.

In an earlier interview, Prybyla was asked his thoughts regarding America's economic performance within the free market system as compared to the strongly directed Japanese collaboration with its ministry of trade.

Prybyla said that America's economy is performing well, comparing the United States to other countries world-wide. He said investors are pouring their dollars into America's economy by purchasing U.S. government bonds, investing in American real estate and in the stock market.

Prybyla said the world has great confidence in the American economy and such investments are expressions of this trust.

He said the United States and Japan are both market economies and both are playing by the same rules. Japan and Europe, however, operate in the markets according to their cultural values.

Prybyla emphasized that the differences are cultural. A homogeneous society like Japan can accept centralized direction. In contrast, a heterogeneous society such as the United States is wary of government interference and prefers a laissez-faire attitude.

Prybyla concluded that the United States is still the most powerful economy in the world.

Prybyla also said that market economics is the best system of providing goods and services to people. Planned economies like those in the Soviet Union and China have bankrupted the systems and have created further problems, he said.

The leaders of the Soviet Union and China realize they no longer can go on with a centrally controlled economic system and are implementing the concepts of market economies, he explained.

Regarding the United States' continued trade imbalance, Prybyla said that the trade issue has become a political football. It is not as serious at this time as some would say. The $170 billion the United States has imported has benefited everyone, including the users as well as the manufacturers.

He said that rational consumers are purchasing the best products for the best price. It just so happens that such products are made in Japan, Korea or Taiwan.

Ironically, the Japanese now are producing sneakers in the Philippines because of the comparative price advantage, said Prybyla.

He said that difficulties with the imbalance of payments or debt may occur if payment is demanded of the United States.

In addition, the United States has been far too liberal with its trade policy and open markets, said Prybyla. The United States needs to persuade the Japanese to create a more level playing field so its industries can compete, he said.

The Japanese would not be able to enjoy their standard of living if it were not for the American marketplace, he said. More than half of the Japanese economy is American-dependent, he added.

The United States is competitive in financial services such as advertising and especially agriculture.

The United States must liberalize the trade laws with tough negotiations, he explained.

Prybyla concluded that the common market that Europe plans to implement in 1992 will be a reality. It will provide a continent-sized market, like the United States, which will provide a better standard of living and hopefully make Europeans better neighbors with one another.

In addition, he said that Europe will become a significant competitor to the United States because the United States will be dealing with one large economy, as opposed to many small ones.

One U.S. response has been to create a free-trade agreement with Canada, which will provide access to larger markets and resources.

Nation agonizes over drugs

Bush, Dukakis propose answers

By DANIEL MORIARTY
Staff Reporter

Current public opinion polls indicate that Americans perceive illegal drug use as the most urgent threat facing national security.

In response, presidential candidates Vice President George Bush and Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis have both proposed extensive programs to fight the war against drugs.

"Voters rate the [Reagan] administration's campaign against drugs a failure," the New York Times reported in April.

Efforts of the administration's National Narcotics Border Interdiction System [NNBIS] focused on stopping drug suppliers before they reached the United States.

NNBIS reports the number of nations now trying to eradicate drug crops has increased from two to 23.

Problems in foreign relations have developed, however, particularly with Mexico, which forbids the United States to conduct hot pursuit raids over Mexican borders.

Furthermore, U.S. News and World Report noted in April that cocaine imports have tripled to 150 tons per year during the Reagan administration, while prices for the drug have fallen.

"At the moment, there is no disposition whatever in Congress for legalization [of presently illegal drug use]," said Morgon Kondracke recently in The New Republic.

Dukakis proposes a national program enabling communities to develop drug curriculums for school children, "kindergarten through 12th grade," and to enact policies for treating and prosecuting drug users.

Dukakis models his proposal after a similar program he implemented in Massachusetts.

Opponents argue that under the Dukakis proposal, school dropouts cannot be helped and anti-drug efforts are likely to be inconsistent from one community to the next.

However, Dukakis cites a 1987 Massachusetts survey indicating that 50.8 percent of high school students had used illegal drugs once or more, compared to 59.7 percent in 1984.

According to the Christian Science Monitor in May, Bush's proposal for convicted drug users includes loss of driver's license, loss of federal aid such as student loans and housing, compulsory probation and rehabilitation. He also supports drug education in schools.

As vice president, Bush headed NNBIS and its prototype, the South Florida Task Force.

Opponents of the Bush approach claim that drug prices are falling and abuse rising since the program began.

Bush points out that the rate of drug-related convictions has recently increased nationally.

Both candidates advocate using the military and, according to the Wall Street Journal in June, Bush also suggests an international drug fighting force.

Secretary of Defense Frank Carlucci opposes "anything that would put the military in a [domestic] law enforcement role," although the military has already begun anti-drug operations."

In the past the Coast Guard and the Customs Service have shared primary responsibility for drug interdiction, according to a May issue of the Christian Science Monitor.

Bush proposes appointing the vice president to be head of all anti-drug efforts.

Similarly, Dukakis calls for the appointment of a "drug fighting czar," according to the Wall Street Journal in June.

Bush advocates executing convicted drug "kingpins."

Dukakis does not advocate the execution of criminals.

Villanova Security Chief, Morgon P. Kelly, a narcotics officer in Harlem from 1972 to 1973, seemed to express the feelings of the American public, as reflected in Bush's and Dukakis' positions on this issue. He said, "This is a critical issue. We must use whatever we have and attack it in every possible direction to get the job done."

Dukakis proposes program

By College Press Service

Democratic presidential nominee Gov. Michael Dukakis unveiled a plan Sept. 7 to let students repay their college loans at a rate that depends on how much they earn after they graduate.

The idea, which has been tried at a number of campuses, drew mixed reviews.

Bruce Carnes, deputy undersecretary at the U.S. Department of Education, said it would "soak" students who got well-paying jobs after graduation.

He predicted students training to take higher-salaried jobs would refuse to join the program, forcing the federal government to kick in dollars to cover the loan costs of lower-paid students who would never repay all that they owed.

Dukakis aide Thomas Herman was more enthusiastic.

"This is not only feasible, it is desirable," he said. "It will allow everyone who is qualified and wants to go to college to go to college."

"It is a substantive proposal, one that should be discussed," said Bob Aaron of the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges.

"We're extremely pleased that one of the presidential candidates has come forth with a new and imaginative program for college loans for people from all walks of life," said Richard Rosser, president of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities.

Janet Lieberman of the U.S. Student Association, which represents campus student governments in Washington, D.C., said, "It's a very creative program to help middle-class families, but it doesn't really address the needs of low-income people."

"What low-income people need is grant money," said Dave Merkowitz of the American Council on Education. "They're the least likely to take out loans. Both presidential candidates need to develop plans to address the needs of the neediest."

The Dukakis plan would allow any student, regardless of family income, to get a federally guaranteed student loan, repay it through mandatory payroll deductions during the student's working years for as long as they work, or "buy out" of the program at any time by paying a lump sum.

As a result, graduates who find jobs with high salaries could pay back more than the interest and principal on their loans, while low-income students may never pay back all they borrowed.

"The problem with [Dukakis'] plan ... is it depends upon people who are likely to make reasonable incomes being willing to get soaked," Carnes said.

Rosser said he believed the federal government will have to subsidize the program to keep it viable — something Dukakis says will not be necessary — but in the long run would deal "with the student loan default question in a very effective way," thus saving taxpayers millions of dollars.

Because the government would take its payment directly out of graduates' paychecks, the default rate, at least theoretically, would be minimal.

"It's nice that under this plan you can graduate and go into a low-paying job like teaching and nursing and not worry about paying off your loans," said Lieberman. "We appreciate the

Villanova ranked nationally

Placed eighth among comprehensive schools

By PEARSE MC DADE
Staff Reporter

U.S. News and World Report recently released its yearly feature on America's best comprehensive institutions, ranking Villanova University eighth on its list.

Villanova finished behind (in order) Wake Forest University, Trinity University, University of Richmond, the Citadel, Worcester Polytechnic Institute, Santa Clara University and Fairfield University.

"The nation's 399 comprehensive colleges and universities fill an immense middle ground that provides American higher education with much of its intellectual variety and academic vitality," the article stated.

"Though they are neither major research universities nor intimate liberal-arts colleges, these institutions of no fewer than 2,500 students are nonetheless comprehensive in the wide range of liberal-arts, professional and occupational programs they offer undergraduate and graduate students," the article stated.

The method used in determining these rankings included both objective and subjective evaluative techniques. These included "the quality of the student body as determined by the school's selectivity, strength of the faculty and teaching, extent of resources, ability to retain students through graduation and reputation for academic excellence," according to the article.

Additional factors included average combined SAT (Scholastic Aptitude Test) scores, high school class standings, student-to-faculty ratios, faculty salaries and the percentage of full-time professors with doctorates.

Wake Forest University was praised for such academic programs as the addition of interdisciplinary honors courses and greater diversity of the student body through minority recruitment.

The university's number one position was further substantiated by its instructional budget of $14,205 for each of its students.

This is comparable to Ivy League schools, where Yale University spends $15,291 per student, the report stated.

Merrimack College in North Andover, Mass., selected the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., former University President, to be the prior of its monastery effective Nov. 1, said the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs.

Driscoll, as prior to the monastery, will serve as the leader of the Augustinian community at Merrimack. His duties will include supervising the material and spiritual welfare of the Augustinians, said the Rev. John Rotelle, O.S.A., of the provincial office, and archives.

Rotelle said he considered the position "very important" to the Augustinian community.

Gallen did not know in what capacity Driscoll would be associated with the University in the future.

Merrimack College is a coeducational institution of approximately 2,400 students.

Driscoll could not be reached for comment during the past two weeks.

McGovern to lecture

Press Release

Former U.S. Sen. George McGovern will discuss "The Making of the President" on Oct. 25 at 8 p.m. in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center.

In the 1950s McGovern was elected to the House of Representatives and served on the House Committee on Education and Labor. He soon established himself in the forefront of the liberal wing of the Democratic party.

In 1961 he was chosen by President John F. Kennedy to head the Food for Peace Program. Under McGovern, the program funded $11 billion to feed and clothe the needy of the world.

McGovern was elected to the U.S. Senate from South Dakota in 1962. He was the first Democrat to be elected to the Senate from South Dakota since 1936.

During his first term, McGovern was one of the initial leaders of opposition to the war in Vietnam.

His leadership in the anti-war movement led to his successful grassroots campaign for the 1972 Democratic presidential nomination. After waging an unsuccessful campaign for the presidency against incumbent Richard Nixon, McGovern returned to the U.S. Senate to continue his work on behalf of minorities, the poor and other marginalized Americans.

McGovern has also written several books, including "Agricultural Thought in the 20th Century," "A Time of War/A Time of Peace" and "Grassroots."

The Villanova Student Union is sponsoring the lecture. Tickets are $2 for students and faculty and $3 for the public. They will go on sale Oct. 11, at the Connelly Center ticket office.

Alcohol Awareness week held

By SHEILA A. COURTER
Staff Reporter

Alcohol Awareness Week at Villanova began yesterday and will continue until Wednesday, said Janice Janosik, director of the Alcohol and Drug Prevention Center.

The vice presidents of the Villanova Student Union, Resident Student Association (RSA), Association of Commuting Students (ACS), Panhellenic Council, Interfraternity Council (IFC) and WKVU are responsible for programming the scheduled events.

They are under the consultation of Janosik, said John Price and Maura Nolan, president and vice president of the Villanova Student Union, respectively. The main objective of the week is to make students more responsible in their drinking behavior, Nolan added.

According to Susan Bennett, vice president of Panhellenic, Council, Price and Nolan, the week's activities include the distribution of alcohol awareness information in the Connelly Center by the Student Union today.

On Sunday and Monday nights, speakers will be present in the residence halls from 8 p.m. to 12 a.m. to discuss alcoholism on college campuses, they said. A schedule of locations and times will be posted on Thursday in the residence halls. This is sponsored by the ACS and RSA.

Also, Sunday is Greek T-shirt Day, when T-shirts will be sold for the occasion, they said. ACS will also sponsor an alcohol awareness film in Connelly Center on Tuesday.

On Wednesday the IFC will sponsor a lecture by William Keim, a national speaker from Oregon, in the Villanova Room at 7 p.m. Also, in conjunction with WKVU, a non-alcoholic concert will take place at 23 East Cabaret at 9 p.m.

The Alcohol and Drug Prevention Center, located in the basement of Stanford Hall, instructed the resident assistants [RA's] to organize floor meetings in all residence halls for in-house programming about alcohol prevention and intervention, said Janosik. She said she would like the RAs to promote responsible decision-making in the use of alcohol.

Janosik said students should know what they are drinking, how much, what their limits are and ways to avoid drinking in peer pressure situations. She added that students are going to drink anyway, so they must be taught to do it responsibly.

One of Janosik's main points in the education of alcohol awareness is avoiding the rapid ingestion of alcohol. For instance, avoid chugging, funnels, shotguns or quarters, which will increase blood alcohol concentration [BAC] levels. Increased BAC can result in blackouts, passing out, coma, or even death, according to a pamphlet distributed by the center on the dangers of alcohol.

Janosik said she believes that alcohol itself is not a problem, the problem lies in the way one chooses to use alcohol.

Minority recruiter needed

The Office of Admissions is currently reviewing applications for the position of minority recruiter, previously filled by Denise Houser, said Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice president for Academic Affairs, Tuesday.

Houser left the position over the summer after taking a job with Arco in Virginia, said Cherry.

Cherry said, "[Houser] played a strong role" in attracting more minorities to the University.

Houser organized and implemented the minority open house for the past three years. At the conclusion of last year's open house, she said, "Many new students said they would be definitely coming."

"It has been a goal of the University all along to increase minority enrollment," Cherry continued. "She [Houser] was able to attract a larger amount of minority applicants."

Director of Personnel G. Thomas Bull said, "There is nothing dramatic about the situation." He explained that Houser had left and the position was filled at the end of the summer, but that the applicant had withdrawn his acceptance for personal reasons.

After the first applicant declined the offer of the position, Cherry explained that the search had to start again because of the time lapse.

The position was then advertised in The Philadelphia Inquirer and the response was "not good," he said. The position was then advertised in The Chronicle of Higher Education. "We're hoping that the ad will attract good applicants," Cherry said.

High tuitions delay entrances

High tuitions are forcing low-income students to delay going to college, the U.S. Department of Education concluded last week.

In a new installment of an ongoing study called "High School and Beyond," department statisticians, who have been following 30,000 students who were high school sophomores in 1980 through their educational careers, found that about 11 percent of the students who eventually went to college simply could not afford to start classes immediately after high school.

Most of the students who delayed starting college, moreover, were from low-income families.

The figures tend to contradict recent campus assurances that tuition increases, which have exceeded the general inflation rate for eight years in a row, are not keeping people away from school.

Book censorship continues

Would-be censors did not temper their efforts to ban certain books and ideas from schools during the past year, according to a civil liberties group that tracks censorship efforts.

"Censorship remains a problem nationwide, a problem that threatens the basic character and fundamental integrity of the public schools," said Arthur Kropp, president of People for the American Way (PFAW), the group that issued the report, called "Attacks on the Freedom to Learn."

PFAW counted 157 attempts to censor school materials during the last year. Approximately one-third of the tries were successful.

"The most frequently condemned book was one of American literature's greatest classics Of Mice and Men [by John Steinbeck], which was challenged in schools from Maine to Oregon," Kropp said at a Washington, D.C. news conference Aug. 31.

Working students stay in school

College students who hold down part-time jobs are less likely to drop out of school, the U.S. Department of Education has found.

"Work may motivate students to study harder, and the socialization associated with working may be beneficial for college persistence," study author Dennis Carroll wrote in a summary of the report's findings.

Some 93 percent of the students who worked part-time during their first year in college returned for a second year, compared to 83 percent of the students who did not hold a job during their freshman years.

One in 12 students worked jobs requiring more than 41 hours per week, while only 25 percent of the students who worked had jobs that consumed less than 20 hours per week.

Harassment policy

matters of University procedure, Desmond explained.

The committee will now serve to advise the president in ways to raise consciousness about the issue. "The task now is how to educate students, faculty, administration and employees of the University about the nature of sexual harassment and how to prevent or avoid it," Desmond said.

"Most people think of overt acts of aggressive, physical advances as sexual harassment. This is a misconception, for the problem is much more subtle. Something as simple as jokes which portray women as objects is sexual harassment, and women should not have to be exposed to this," Desmond explained.

Immerwahr said in an article in the April 15 issue of the Villanovan that comments on people's clothes or appearance, jokes and sexual banter were examples of sexual harassment.

The article cited a report by the Association of American Colleges, which stated that "a chilling classroom climate puts women students at a significant educational disadvantage. Overtly disparaging remarks about women, as well as more subtle differential behaviors, can have a critical and lasting effect."

"I think people may be doing things that are sexually harassing without realizing it. An educational process would heighten their awareness and create a climate here where sexual harassment won't even be suspected, let alone a reality," said Dobbin.

Immerwahr explained that the committee has looked to other schools as models concerning education about sexual harassment. He said that many have prepared elaborate brochures that contain a procedural policy as well as explain what sexual harrassment is and what to do if and when one encounters it.

Workshops are also an effective tool of education about the issue, he added. Some workshops include the use of videotapes that dramatize episodes of sexual harassment, and subsequent discussion about the scenes serve to define the problem and eliminate confusion, Immerwahr noted.

Desmond said that Dobbin plans to appoint a complaint officer who would preside over matters involving sexual harassment.

Desmond explained, "The office of Student Life handles all cases of harassment involving students. Academic Affairs has jurisdiction over cases involving faculty, and the director of personnel handles all University employees.

"The appointment of a complaint officer would alleviate the problems when a case involves a student and faculty member, or a faculty member and an employee, for example. This will make the process quicker and more efficient," she noted.

Education about sexual harassment will begin with incoming freshmen and new employees to the University, she said.

Divestment from South Africa

"Several years ago there was a heightening of consciousness of [South Africa and divestment]. The initial movement was headed by the Rev. Leon Sullivan ... and instead of divestiture, he set up certain principles that would allow a clean operation in terms of integration," Dobbin said.

The Sullivan Principles were established as a voluntary code of conduct for American businesses with South African subsidiaries. The principles included non-segregation of workers, equal and fair employment practices, training programs for black and Asian employees and an improvement in the quality of employees' lives outside the work environment.

"The Sullivan Principles were basically the principles which most colleges ... universities and responsible groups used as their criteria. Villanova was involved right from the start in that," said Dobbin.

"As soon as this became a social issue that was widely recognized, we condemned apartheid and adhered right away to the Sullivan Principles," he added.

He said that the University's divestment was a moral statement, but that he would not condemn others who refused to make that statement.

"I think all morally responsible people condemn apartheid, but I think people can disagree as to what the best strategy to deal with it would be. Obviously Villanova's Board of Trustees has decided divestiture would be the best way," Dobbin added.

Bob Dais, a member of the Student Coalition Against Apartheid and Racism (SCAAR), said, "If the University has truly divested from South Africa, that's tremendous."

He said that the University's divestiture would further the cause of SCAAR, since one of its major goals this year was to inform the public as to whether Villanova still had investments in companies which did business in South Africa.

SCARR sets plans

By ANNE LOMBARDI
Staff Reporter

The Student Coalition Against Apartheid and Racism (SCAAR) will continue to educate the University community about apartheid, racism and work "towards justice in South Africa," said Kim Valentine, one of the organization's founding members.

In April, Valentine initiated the group's formation to raise consciousness of the plight of South African blacks.

Late last semester, the group staged a march across campus from the Center for Peace and Justice Education to the office of the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., former University president.

The purpose of the march was in part to question the University's investments in South Africa, said student Bob Dais, another member of the group.

The group felt the march was especially successful, said Dais and Valentine. Other students joined the march as it made its way across campus. Underclassmen involvement was especially strong, they said.

SCAAR's research committee is currently investigating whether Villanova is divested from its holdings in South Africa. According to Dais, "We [Villanova] are supposed to be leading moral issues and there is [a possibility] that we're not."

The University is completely divested from its holdings in South Africa, said the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, in an interview last week.

Plans for the group include films and guest lecturers. The possibility of a week devoted to awareness of apartheid, similar to Hunger Awareness Week, has been discussed among members. Valentine said she also hopes "successive semesters will make impressions on campus."

SCAAR held its first organizational meeting of the year on Oct. 4 in the Center for Peace and Justice Education. Ed Sullivan, associate director of the center, serves as advisor to the group. More information on SCAAR can be obtained at the center, located in the basement of Sullivan Hall.

Register

where registration forms were rejected because the student had not filled in a phone number. "You can't reject a voter registration if there is no phone. It's the kind of harassment that is meant to intimidate students," he said.

Boyd said that the voter registration office does return voter registration cards, but only if certain information has not been provided. She said, "It costs a lot of money to send it back in the mail ... we're reaching a point where the forms are in such a condition that we won't mail it anymore."

She said she felt that people, and students in particular, do not treat voter registration with the importance it warrants. She cited examples where a student from Villanova had written in "keg" for the choice of political party. On another card she had seen, for the section of sex the student had responded, "three times a week."

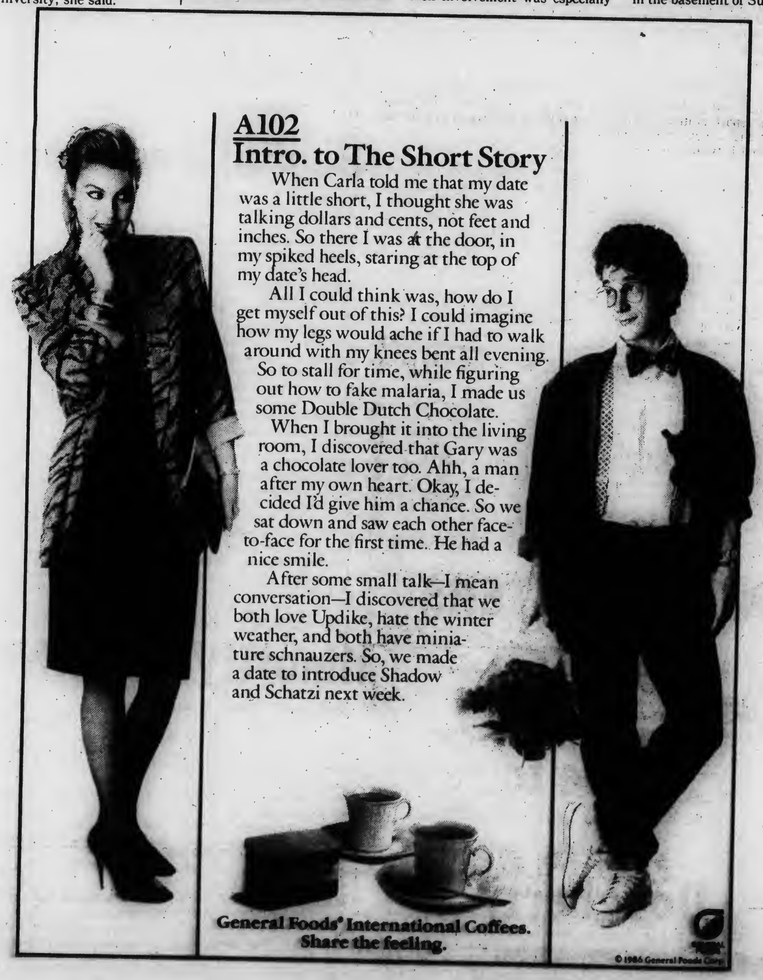
DesJardins explained that Delaware County is a Republican stronghold. Republican County officials assign the jobs in the county offices to fellow Republicans.

"There is primarily a fear of voting power [from county officials]," said DesJardins. "People are afraid of the potential political power that Villanova students have ... since it's the biggest university, it is the biggest threat," he added.

Arline Kerrigan, secretary of external affairs in Student Government, recently said, "By registering to vote we're showing the community that we care enough about the community to vote ... we're trying to offer a service and the only thing we're coming up against are road blocks."

John Lewis, Student Government president-elect, said, "I know a lot about students' rights to vote and if anything goes wrong, there will be hell to pay."

Gallagher said, "It seems as though county officials are deliberately trying to foil the registration of the students."



Values surveyed

By DIANE CILIONE
Staff Reporter

Villanova students saw the Mission Statement objective "to involve students in the development of University policy," as having the largest discrepancy between how the objective "should" be and how it actually "is" prioritized at the University, according to a University survey.

The University's Human Organization Science Institute published a report in February summarizing the results of a values study, a survey of the University community taken as part of the Program Evaluation Committee project.

The study was conducted to "determine [the University population] general and specific evaluations of the essential dimensions of the Villanova University Mission Statement," stated the report.

The survey sample population included 1,654 non-student respondents and 1,196 student respondents with a return rate of 58.9 percent and 49.0 percent respectively, according to the report. The total response rate for the survey sample was 54.7 percent.

The non-student population of the survey sample included trustees, administrators, exempt employees, non-exempt employees, full-time faculty, part-time faculty and alumni, the report stated.

The Mission Statement objective "To sustain a high quality of faculty" was given the highest "should be" rating by the survey respondents, stated the report. The perceived discrepancy among the respondents on this objective about what "should be" as opposed to what "is" is a "relatively large difference."

The report stated, "This ... means that a substantial gap is perceived between the ideal and the actual importance of [the objective] at the University."

The full-time faculty, as a survey population sub-group, registered "the lowest level of satisfaction with the prioritization of this objective," added the report.

The highest real-ideal discrepancy in the survey is perceived in the objective "to provide resources to support excellence in teaching.

"The 'is' and 'ought' gap looms large in the perceptions of the administrators, full-time faculty, and part-time faculty, all subpopulations for whom teaching resources are an immediate practical concern," according to the report.

The objectives "to provide communication between all segments of the University" and "to develop and maintain programs that will facilitate good will between Villanova and the local community," were perceived as other objectives which show high discrepancy levels, stated the report.

The Mission Statement objective "to stress philosophy and religious studies in the undergraduate academic programs," was given the lowest rating in terms of ideal importance in the survey, stated the report statistics.

The real application of the objective was perceived as positive, meaning that "indicates a typical response suggesting more current stress on undergraduate philosophy and religious studies than is ideal," according to the report.

The objective "to enhance Villanova University's status as an Augustinian Roman Catholic University" shows almost no discrepancy between ideal and actual prioritization of the objective in the survey as a whole, according to the report.

The sub-population differences, however, are "striking" on this objective, documented the report.

"The undergraduate, graduate, and law student sub-populations indicate a consensus that the University is already beyond the ideal level in the implementation of this objective," stated the report.

"By contrast, their negative average discrepancy scores suggest that trustees and administrators hold the opposite opinion," it added.

"To develop and maintain high quality undergraduate academic programs [is an objective which] has the second highest average 'should be' score and the highest single rating of present importance of any objective in the survey," the report stated. The highest discrepancies perceived in this objective were among full-time faculty and undergraduate students, explained the report.

Respect Life Week held

By KRISTEN FALLAN
Staff Reporter

Villanovans for Life [VFL] sponsored Respect Life Week this week to address and bring attention to social action issues of today.

VFL was originally organized in 1973 when abortion was first legalized. Since that time, VFL has increased its involvement with not only the anti-abortion movement, but also with caring for the young, elderly, underprivileged, handicapped and homeless.

"We are going to a good school where we are not exposed to this [problems of this nature]," said Marie Bowersock, president of VFL. Bowersock said she feels the campus needs to address these issues and education is the first step.

As part of this awareness process, speaker Tom Boyle, a University alumnus and representative of Covenant House, addressed on Oct. 3 the issues involving juveniles who make their home on the streets of New York City. Also speaking was George Isajin, M.D., of the University, on the topic of infanticide on Oct. 4.

Joanne Giordano of VFL said, "All life, no matter what stage, is important ... people need to be personalized ... they are not mere things."

Nationally, Respect Life Sunday has become a major theme, but VFL has devoted this entire week to focus on the various issues. In addition to the speakers, other events of Respect Life Week included a 1960s-style coffeehouse and the delivery of "I care" packages.

The respect for life issues before the University community, said Bowersock, is like "a 'seamless garment' issue ... if you believe in one form [of life], then you should believe in any form."

VFL has planned activities throughout the year with local underprivileged children and the elderly, as well as the campus blood drive, the March for Life in Washington, D.C., films and visiting speakers, Bowersock added.

Additional information may be obtained at the VFL weekly meeting held at 4:30 p.m. on Thursdays in the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

Dobbin

The convening of the convocation was delivered by the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs, followed by the singing of the national anthem, and an invocation by Margaret M. Healy, a member of the Board of Trustees.

A series of salutations were then given by representatives of students, staff, alumni, other colleges and the Archdiocese of Philadelphia. This was proceeded by a rendition of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" given by the chorale.

The Presentation of the President was then made by Driscoll. The Rev. Edward J. McCarthy, O.S.A., chairman of the Board of Trustees and 29th president, gave the investiture and charge to the president, assisted by Mace Bearer the Rev. Thomas T. Welsh, O.S.A., 28th president, and Symbol of Office Bearer Margaret Healy.

Dobbin was presented with a presidential medallion made of brass, copper and silver, portraying the seal of the University in its center.

Dobbin then delivered his inaugural address. After acknowledging his audience, he went on to describe Villanova's identity as a university. "Our identity is who and what we are, have been and aspire to become. It includes our collective consciousness ... embodied in the very fabric of the institution: its symbols, its charter, its mission statement, its way of life, its lore."

Dobbin emphasized a few essentials of Villanova's "story." First tracing its roots as an American university, he depicted the University's progress in American higher education since its founding in 1842.

The president then spoke of Villanova's identity as a Catholic university. "We are deeply conscious of our Catholic heritage and of our responsibility to bring the Catholic tradition to bear on the intellectual and cultural climate of our time," he said.

Thirdly, Dobbin illustrated the University's Augustinian character. "It transcends the presence of courses, lectures and institutes devoted to Augustine's thought," said Dobbin. "It consists, rather, of certain characteristics of Augustine's legacy. They are not unique to Villanova, as Augustine's heritage is not, but by emphasizing them Villanova actualizes its own unique identity."

Dobbin further emphasized the Augustinian concepts of relationship between heart and mind, the role of community and unity of knowledge.

Concluding, Dobbin set goals to reduce the number of students, to create on-campus housing for at least 1,400 more students and to increase endowments.

He also said he will form task forces to investigate the heightening of the intellectual and cultural atmosphere on campus and the adding of new facilities, including office space, health care facilities and laboratory and seminar space.

The inauguration ended with the singing of the alma mater, a benediction and recession.

Dukakis' loan program

creativity."

Yale University had a similar loan program for 3,600 students from 1972 to 1978, in which students could borrow a portion of their tuition from the school and begin repaying it after graduation at a rate of four-tenths of 1 percent — or $4 per year — for each $1,000 borrowed.

Dukakis' plan, by contrast, would have students repay their loans at a rate of $8 per year for every $1,000 borrowed.

"We still think it's a plausible idea," said Yale University's Donald Routh, director of financial aid.

Routh said Yale dropped the idea because it required massive amounts of capital to maintain it. Administrators figured it would take 17 years before payments would reduce the outstanding balance owed the university.

Yet fears that students anticipating a high income would not participate in such a program proved not to be true, Routh added.

Carnes' own U.S. Department of Education also has promoted an "income contingent loan" program, now being tested at 10 campuses.

In his last two federal college budget proposals, in fact, President Ronald Reagan asked Congress to replace virtually all Guaranteed Student Loans with income-contingent loans, but Congress, heeding educators' testimony that it was too early to tell if the idea is workable, opted for a pilot program instead.

Under the Reagan plan, all borrowers would have to repay all the principal and interest they owed in a prescribed time.

Under Dukakis' plan, loan repayments would come directly out of graduates' paychecks, much like their Social Security payments.

Graduates would not have repayments deducted from earnings over a certain cap, probably to be set somewhere between $50,000 and $100,000 a year.

For instance, graduates who borrowed $20,000 to get through college and earned $20,000 would repay the government $500 in a year, or 2.5 percent of their income.

Students would take out the loans, which would be guaranteed by the government, through banks.

Aaron said he thought it interesting that Dukakis, who has trailed Republican presidential nominee George Bush in the polls since mid-August, unveiled the "substantive" proposal because he thinks it is something the American people want.

No student aid for drug dealers

By College Press Service

Student drug dealers or users should not be able to get federal financial aid for 10 years after they are convicted, the U.S. House of Representatives said the week of Sept. 11.

In a 335-67 vote, the House approved H.R. 5210. If the U.S. Senate also approves the bill, the purging of drug dealers and users from student aid roles will become law.

Labeled as "bad policy" by Charles Saunders of the American Council on Education, the bill would deny student aid and other federal benefits for up to 10 years for drug dealers sentenced to prison terms of a year or longer.

The bill denies student aid and other federal benefits for up to five years from anyone convicted of two drug offenses in 10 years. Students who complete a drug rehabilitation program could regain their eligibility, however.

"This amendment encourages people to get drug treatment," said co-sponsor Rep. William Hughes (D-N.H.). "How much is a young man or woman going to accomplish in [college] if they're on serious drugs?"

"Why should American taxpayers support students who in turn support a drug habit or traffic in drugs?" asked Missouri lawmaker Thomas Coleman (R), another supporter of the bill.

"Do the proponents of [H.R. 5210] mean to imply that we find even a relatively minor drug-related offense more heinous than murder, rape and other violent felonies?" replied Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.), noting other kinds of criminals can qualify for student aid after serving their debt to society.

Not many students, however, actually would lose anything if the bill becomes law. Since only a few students are convicted of drug offenses each year, the idea "doesn't affect a whole lot of students," Saunders added.

Boston University sets strict visitation policy

By College Press Service

Boston University (BU) rejected student protests and issued strict new rules Sept. 15 prohibiting students from having overnight guests of the opposite sex in their dorm rooms.

"All of life after 11 p.m. has been banned at BU," senior Jamie Sanbonmatsu told a crowd of 2,000 students that gathered to protest the visitation rules the day before they were approved.

BU's strict new rules may be the closest a college has returned to the "in loco parentis" relationship schools maintained with their students up until the 1960's. Under the doctrine literally meaning administrators acted "in place of the parents" campuses set curfews for students, suspended students for behaving in ways they did not like and forbade students of the opposite sex to visit with each other behind closed doors.

Though the rules collapsed under student protests for greater autonomy, new drinking laws and increasing numbers of student lawsuits blaming colleges for sexual assaults and other crimes have moved many campuses to tighten their control over potentially litigious student behavior during the past few years.

St. Joseph's College in Maine, the State University of New York at Binghamton and North Carolina State University, among others, also have restricted or banned overnight visits to dorms by members of the opposite sex in recent years.

Virtually every campus in the United States, moreover, has stiffened its student drinking rules since 1986, when the federal government threatened to cut off funding to any state that still allowed 18-year-olds to drink alcohol.

BU officials said they were just trying to help students study.

The new rules, said BU spokesman Kevin Carleton, address "concerns stated by students, staff and parents that residences too often have failed to provide the kind of environment where an individual can quietly study and have his or her right to privacy respected."

Sanbonmatsu, on the other hand, charged, "The administration is stunting our growth and development by denying us the right to make decisions."

Under the new guidelines, some of which go into effect in late fall and others during the spring, guests must display identificatin cards and leave the dormitory by 11 p.m. on weekdays and 1 a.m. on weekends.

Overnight guests of the same sex are still allowed, but guests of the opposite sex will not be allowed to stay overnight.

Students older than age 21 can bring a six-pack of beer or a liter of other kinds of alcoholic beverages into the dorms, but no more than that.

Carleton student protests of the rules did not faze BU officials. "I don't think any demonstration would have an effect," he said. "What can have an effect is a reasonable discussion."

Progress continues on new dormitories

By E.H. McELDOWNEY
Staff Reporter

Two new dormitories currently under construction on south campus are scheduled to open by June of 1989, according to Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life.

Progress on the project has exceeded earlier expectations, which predicted completion by next fall, said Neville recently.

The dormitories will add 240 more beds to the University and will "finish off" construction plans for the south campus area. "We don't plan to build more down there," Neville said.

The dormitories will resemble St. Monica and Katherine residence halls, except that they will be three floors high instead of four. Neville said concessions were made to Radnor Township to get permission to build.

Another similarity, and another concession, concerns the windows of the dormitories. To help prevent excess noise in the area, the windows will not open. As a consequence, the dormitories are more expensive because they require forced air circulation year-round, Neville said.

The University is currently studying options concerning who is to live in the residence halls. Neville said that because of the housing commitment the University has to nursing students, one of the dormitories will most likely be a women's hall. If so, a women's dormitory on main campus might be switched to a men's hall.

Neville added that the dormitories were designed so that security issues can be better addressed.

Neville also said that the addition of 240 beds will be used to house upperclassmen, not to create a larger freshman class next year. "This will help mainly juniors and seniors," he said. "Two hundred forty less students will have to move off campus."

Neville added that this is the beginning of a series of additional dormitories to deal with the problems of students residing in the township. Current plans also include an addition of 1,000 beds on the west campus area.

The food service on south campus should be "adequate" to deal with the new students, said Neville. He added that Donahue Hall, the south campus cafeteria, was designed with the addition of these halls taken into consideration.

Default problems continue

by College Press Service

The Reagan administration has again proposed not to make college loans to students who attend colleges where a high number of people have defaulted on loans.

It also wants to make banks that have made a lot of "bad" student loans assume some of the risk of default.

The proposals, published in the Sept. 14 Federal Register, will become an official rule if they are not challenged within 90 days.

Bruce Carnes of the U.S. Dept. of Education, in announcing the proposals, released figures showing that 10 percent of the banks making student loans had at least one of every five loans it made in default.

Those banks, said Carnes, generally made loans to students attending private, for-profit trade schools.

Former Secretary of Education William J. Bennett, who has in the past termed the student loan default rate "intolerable," said termination was the most severe sanction an institution could face. "Other, lesser sanctions would also be available."

The proposed rules would require the trade schools to disclose state licensing and certification requirements, and the pass rates and job placement rates of their graduates.

The schools will also have to provide pro-rated refunds to students who do not complete their programs if the new rules are enacted.

Bennett has charged the training schools with ripping off students. "Too often the only thing they get out of these schools is debt."

The administration drew a vehement reaction from trade schools when it first floated the idea last spring. School lobbyists protested most defaulters were relatively poor students who could not afford to go to more traditional colleges or universities.

The General Accounting Office, Congress' investigative arm, also has found students default on their loans most typically because they do not have the money to repay, not because they are deadbeats who simply choose not to repay them.

how we felt," he said.

"What I found interesting was that Bond pointed out the interest in the Christian social gospel as the driving force in SNCC and other movements like it," Pigeon commented. "It was more inspired by feeling of moral responsibility than political motivations."

Pigeon compared the attitude of the 1960s, one that acted out its Christian social gospel, to today's attitude, which tends toward an evangelical gospel — preaching over acting out God's word.

Following his lecture, Bond fielded questions from the audience, which dealt with civil rights and prejudice in today's society. He discussed topics such as the 1988 presidential candidates, their lack of attention towards the civil rights issue, and the highly publicized Tawana Brawley case.

Bond expressed a feeling of frustration that the Brawley case had become a "racial" issue.

"I would say that Al Sharpton is more indicative of the kind of personalities that a city as diverse as New York can produce. If people are going to look at Al Sharpton and say 'Well, it's those black people again,' it says something about that person," he commented.

Bond said there is a general apathy toward the civil rights movement today. He said it is due to the country's leadership, which he said neglects its duty to insure the quality of life for all peoples.

Bond stressed the need to take action against apathy, and that those who were active in the 1960's, should act as examples of how people can make a difference.

"Take Rosa Parks for example. She just said 'no,'" he commented.

Addressing a question about forced busing and job quotas, Bond said, "It wasn't called 'busing' when I was bused past a white school to a black school farther away."

In support of job quotas, he said, "This law simply forces employers to do something that is morally and legally correct, and I see nothing wrong with that."

Pigeon said he was impressed by the fact that the audience consisted mostly of students, and also by the number of questions posed by students who wondered what they could do for the movement today.

"I think it speaks volumes about our students," Pigeon said. Alisa Federico, a freshman honors student, said, "I liked that his style was more to raise questions than answer them."

Villanova Violations

By ROGER B. MC CURDY
Staff Reporter

Nearly 50 percent of all violations to date this fall have been a breach of the school's alcohol policies, according to information from Judicial Affairs.

The transgression of the Code of Student Conduct are most often dealt with by Judicial Affairs Officer Dermot Anderson. An interview with Anderson is scheduled upon the student's notification of his alleged violation.

At this meeting the student is informed of the facts and circumstances which led to the charge. He also learns of the rights and options available and the potential sanctions for the alleged violation.

Anderson said the violations to date at Villanova include:

— 38 violations of the alcohol policy
— 29 violations of the visitation policy
— 2 acts of vandalism
— 6 accounts of dangerous practice
— 2 violations of marijuana use his costume. "He was just strolling in when he knew he was late," said Gorski.

While the other Spinners were dressed in red outfits, Edwards performed in casual clothes and a baseball cap. "You wouldn't believe it," he said in a way of explanation before singing "Working My Way Back To You." The Spinners performed for about 35 minutes, singing "I'll Be Around" and "Rubberband Man," among other songs.

Their set was shortened because all the sound equipment had to be shipped to Rochester, N.Y. for Four Tops to use in concert the next night. If the sound system had been late and caused the Four Tops to cancel the concert, "they would've sued Villanova," said Gorski.

Because of all the logistical problems, the contract between Villanova and the Spinners was renegotiated and the Spinners were paid half of the original fee. The Four Tops were paid in full.

Foul-ups plague registrations

By College Press Service

New computer and telephone registration systems, designed to help students get classes more easily and eliminate long lines, have turned into nightmares at some campuses in recent weeks.

The worst foul ups occurred at the University of Colorado, where thousands of students were forced to wait in huge lines, some eight people wide by almost a mile long, to register for fall term.

In North Carolina, students at Appalachian State University waited in long lines for up to three hours to drop or add classes, but had few problems getting the classes they wanted.

Drop/add lines at the University of Tennessee were reported to be shorter than in past years, while the University of Arizona's phone registration was deemed a success, although some classes were overcrowded because of glitches in the system.

"It was easy to figure out," said University of Arizona student Steven Chan.

Colorado students did not think so. "I'm numb," said student Shannon St. Aubin, who waited more than six hours to add courses. "I have no emotion right now. And no classes. And school starts tomorrow."

The university's system could not accommodate the high volume of traffic on drop/add day. Problems with the computer's program forced more students to drop or add classes than expected, and students who attempted to drop or add classes by telephone found the University's phone lines jammed.

"It's a combination of things," spokeswoman Pauline Coker explained. "Any time you try to install a new system there will be bugs and glitches that have to be worked out."

Although most students endured the long lines stoically, campus police report several frustrated students engaged in pushing and shoving matches. No arrests were made.

Campuses nationwide, however, are committed to the new telephone registration systems. The day the University of Colorado's system broke down and paralyzed the academic lives of 20,000 students, the University of Texas at El Paso (UTEP) announced it would start a pilot telephone system next spring.

Dobbin's hopes for Villanova ambitious and optimistic

Villanova history was marked Wednesday as the University inaugurated its 31st president, the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A. We look forward to his administration and anticipate important changes for the future Villanova.

One of the biggest changes for Villanova could be the establishment of coeducational dormitories. Dobbin is not opposed to the idea, nor is he in favor, but more importantly he has requested Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, to issue a report on the issue by December. We feel that student input will be considered and are pleased that controversy of coed dorms for Villanova is finally being addressed.

Another important problem that has been addressed already by Dobbin is Villanova's lack of a sexual harassment policy. We are pleased that he has pushed to complete the five-year project and has recently submitted the policy for the Board of Trustees approval.

We are also pleased that Villanova has completely divested from South Africa.

The zoning of west campus and the construction of new student housing to accommodate all Villanova students are two issues that must have high priority in Dobbin's administration. Villanova should seriously address the overwhelming need for upperclassmen dormitories and apartments as well as guaranteed freshmen housing. Many problems with surrounding townships, although caused by student actions, can be eliminated if the University stops forcing so many of its students to seek housing off campus.

Dobbin's administration needs to reaffirm the University's commitment to a varsity football program. A strong program takes many years to establish and the University should realize the financial losses it will incur until the gains begin. The football program should not be faulted for not breaking even from a monetary standpoint, and the University needs to support the program wholeheartedly or decide to drop the program. It's current half-hearted stand will just hurt the University as a whole.

Moreover, Dobbin's administration should look to improve social activities on campus. Activities such as the Cat's Den and the proposed Casino Night should be increased. The idea of an on-campus pub, with strict carding for proper identification, should be looked into in order to bring seniors back to campus life.

The University must seriously scrutinize its budget and attempt to limit as much as possible tuition increases. Readily available financial aid at Villanova virtually does not exist and the University should take steps to improve this situation immediately.

Villanova must never lose sight of its main goal to educate its students with an emphasis on St. Augustine. The liberal arts curriculum should remain strong and funds for nursing student recruitment should be allocated to ensure the success of the program.

The Dobbin administration has many difficult tasks ahead of it. We look to the future and hope to see the continued success of the University with some integral changes. We wish Dobbin luck and welcome him to Villanova University.

Date rape article biased

To the Editor:

After reading the article "Date Rape at Villanova" in the Sept. 30 issue of the Villanovan, I was shocked and appalled that such biased and misleading information was allowed to be printed.

Although I will be the first to admit that date rape is a serious problem, the manner in which Jennifer Reidy and Noel Falco dealt with exposing it was ridiculous at best.

First of all, they make it quite clear that they view the majority of men on this campus as sex maniacs with no morals whatsoever. They blame every aspect of this crime on the male and make no mention of the preventative measures that these girls failed to take.

The article is no more than shock value journalism since it seems to be aimed at creating a panic rather than informing the population of the dangers, preventative measures, or the male viewpoint involved in this crime.

I find it strange that in nearly every case, everyone at these parties had been drinking, yet no one was drunk. These supposedly sober people proceed to pass out for no apparent reason.

In the case of "Kristen," date rape nearly occurs twice in a very short period of time. Granted, the first time she may have been unaware of the responsibilities she had.

She should never have allowed "Dan" to enter her room after intoxication "hit her all at once." Then three or four months later, she puts herself in the same situation.

I understand that this girl was violated and that is not her fault once she made it clear she did not want to have sex. However, she used extremely poor judgment.

From reading this article, I am sure that Villanova women now think that every guy they meet is after one thing only. Reidy and Falco portray the men on this campus as the lowest of slime possible.

News should be objective and this article reaks of sexist feminism. I can honestly say that I do not know of any guys here who would enjoy forcing someone to have intercourse.

Admittedly, these people certainly do exist, but we should not judge the entire male population by the actions of a few.

Op-ed

Support found for V.U. campus visitation policies

By ANDREW BULLION

It is my intention, with this letter, to commend Noel Falco and Jennifer Reidy for their two-part article on date/acquaintance rape. Their article will no doubt produce many knee-jerk responses, so the writing of it took guts.

My main intention, however, is to retract an editorial cartoon, drawn by myself, which appeared in the Sept. 9 issue of the Villanovan. This cartoon was my first reaction to the newly expanded Villanova overnight vistation/sex policy.

There is an element present in our school that is very steadily undermining our school's reputation and campus life.

It has taken me this long to see the connection, but it is now apparent to me that the acquaintance rape issue and the Villanova visitation policy, are inherently linked, cause and effect. One hates to generalize, as those hurt are usually the only innocents. But having read Falco and Reidy's article and others like it in many other newspapers and magazines, such as the Philadelphia Inquirer, New York Times Magazine, Campus Voice, etc., I can find one common denominator in the issue of rape, and that is, unfortunately, the "modern" male attitude about women and sex.

I know what I read, and what I see and hear everyday. And from that I can only feel relieved that my sister goes to an elite women's college [I used to call it "limited"; now I call it safe], and that my fiancee lives in a country that fosters entirely different attitudes on this subject.

I realize I am probably losing most of my friends by saying these things, but this subject is too important to let pass, as a friend of mine was raped late last year.

There is an element present in our school that is very steadily undermining our school's reputation and campus life. While I am sure that our school is not alone, and that the overwhelming majority of males are, like myself, not rapists of any kind, this problem does exist among us.

This element is most responsible for the curtailment of our privileges, such as a strict visitation policy, and for the preclusion of future privileges, such as coed dorms.

At a senate meeting I attended last year, I overheard an alumni representative state, as his reasoning for voting down coed dorms, "I have three daughters." Now I understand what he meant. So for us to have overnight visitation and coed dorms and everything other schools have, we must first prove that these privileges would not be abused.

In my editorial cartoons I pointed to the rather Orwellian aspects of the visitation policy, such as invasion of privacy, and in fact found much support for this sarcastic portrayal among friends, co-workers, faculty and family. I also thought it to be amusing and a direct hit.

Upon reflection, however, I now know that what I had seen as an unprecedented and drastic flexing of administrative and moralistic muscle was truly a preventative measure, by design or by coincidence, against very serious and increasingly prevalent crimes. I have never been in favor of abuse of power by any party, and I hate unwarranted control.

But I would gladly give up much more than overnight visitation rights and coed dorms if these sacrifices would save even one person from what happened to my friend.

Say "No" to unwanted sex

By KATHRYN QUIGLEY

"Jane and John had been friends for a year. One night, they were at a party and each got drunk. John walked Jane back to her dorm. She invited him up to her room. They listened to music and then began to kiss. Things got pretty intense after awhile. John tried to have sex with Jane. She said, 'No.' He tried again and she said, 'Stop.' John stopped."

This invented incident may have happened to two students on Villanova's campus. Unfortunately, the plea of "No" to unwanted sex is not always heeded, as evidenced by rape and attempted rape incidents that were recounted in last week's Villanovan.

There are few things in this world that are black and white, and rape is one of them. Any time a woman is forced to have sex with a man, it is rape — and it is wrong, both morally and legally.

There are three myths that many men believe regarding rape. The first is that when a woman says "No," she really means "Yes." The truth is that when a woman says "No," she means "No."

A second myth is that the woman "led the man on" and now has to deliver what she had promised. The situation and circumstances can be analyzed later. The man is compelled to stop when the woman says so.

The third myth is that a woman enjoys being raped, because the same nerve fibers are stimulated as during regular sex or worse yet, "... if rape is inevitable, relax and enjoy it."

It is both physically and psychologically impossible for a woman to enjoy being raped.

The forces behind rape, especially date rape, are varied and complicated. As was stated last week, they include sex role stereotypes, mixed messages, poor communication and learned violence. To delve into all those issues would require this article to the 100 times its length.

But what needs to be repeated is this: Any time a man forces a woman to have sex, it is rape. When a woman says "Stop," the man is compelled to stop.

Music must be de-emphasized

By AMY C. SPENCER

Is it Mass or misery? That is a question that I and many other Villanova students have been asking ourselves as we thankfully escape from one of the recent never-ending celebrations held at the Villanova chapel. A Mass which last semester took approximately 50 minutes, now has been known to take one hour and 15 minutes.

What constitutes those extra 25 minutes? Perhaps the priest is offering more spiritual guidance in a longer homily, or communion is taking longer than expected?

No, the extra time is devoted to listening to the liturgical musicians perform. So we are, in effect, being treated to a half-hour concert every Sunday evening.

I do appreciate the service that the musicians offer to the Villanovan community, but their coordinator is faking their mission a little too far.

It is now at the point where Mass seems to be little more than a backdrop for the singers, instead of the other way around. As strange as it may seem to Gary Stegall, the new director of pastoral music, my main reason in attending Mass is not to hear the musicians.

From the moment I set foot in the chapel, I noticed the increased emphasis on music. We are now being asked to practice the songs before Mass begins.

All my life I was taught that we should silently reflect on the week's activities and gradually shift our focus from the crisis of the moment into a more spiritual state of mind. I guess I was wrong. We really should be acquainting ourselves with the hymns, because we certainly would not want to hit a wrong note.

Once we have practiced the songs to perfection, the entrance procession begins. It all seems normal enough, until the priest reaches the altar. Then, the choir continues for a couple more verses, apparently believing we would be disappointed to hear only one verse. The celebrant and the parishioners stand idly by, waiting for the opportunity to begin the Mass.

Why aren't the rest of the students participating along with the choir during these interludes? Probably because Stegall has selected music that is difficult for the non-musician to sing. The featured vocalists sing so high and in such a professional manner that the average church-goer finds it challenging to follow along.

I am pleased that we have such an abundance of vocal talent at Villanova, but church is not the place to showcase it. The purpose of liturgical musicians is to lead the rest of the students, but we are being left behind. At a recent Mass, I could not see one person singing. Many people had their music booklet open, hopelessly trying to follow along.

Campus Ministry needs to take steps to make musical participation in the Mass less of a challenge. The hymns should be an enjoyable part of the celebration, rather than a chore.

I believe that if Stegall would allow the choir to sing only when it is an integral part of the proceedings, rather than droning on for four unneeded verses, and choose songs that are not beyond the ability of the casual singer, a more satisfying experience would result.

Don't blame men

To the Editor:

I sincerely hope that the only responses to the date rape articles by Noel Falco and Jennifer Reidy were that of anger or laughter. I am sure that many men felt the article to be shocking, line after line described them as deranged sexual fiends.

I hope, also, that many Villanova women, especially the month-old freshmen, took the article in stride and not to heart. It is unbelievably demeaning to the men attending Villanova to be so negatively portrayed to the entire female class.

I know date rape is a problem on college campuses, even Villanova; but the article clearly shows a biased, feminist view.

In short, although date rape is a college concern, all men and women must be aware of it. Getting drunk and inviting a member of the opposite sex back to your bedroom, alone, is not an adequate approach to the prevention of it.

To the Editor:

I wish to clarify an issue raised in Patrick Donahoe's letter to the editor of the Sept. 30 issue of the Villanovan.

The checking for identification is not a new practice at Falvey Memorial Library. For years, we have been requiring the presentation of a current Villanova identification card or a library courtesy card for access on weekends and after 5 p.m. weekdays.

This procedure is followed by two main reasons. First, to enhance the security of the facility. Second, to insure that University dollars spent for staffing primarily benefit students and faculty of our institution. In the past we have had heavy use at these times by non-Villanovans.

Thank you

To the Editor:

Last week, the junior mechanical engineers (and the rest of the junior engineers) had a week to top all weeks. Numerous tests, an impossible computer project, labs and a variety of other activities all contributed to some unhappy, exhausted students.

It is at these times when you come to realize that your fellow engineers are not only your very close friends, but they are your life line.

If you need help, someone is there for you. Without each other, we would re-define grade deflation! I would personally like to extend my many thanks to my very close and very special friends, who also happen to be engineers. Without you I would have changed my major a long time ago.

Event mishandled

To the Editor:

I am glad Parents Weekend started on time, needless to say the Four Tops and the Spinners' concert for the parents did not. I would like to express my dissatisfaction for the way the concert was run.

First of all, the line to purchase and pick up tickets was unbelievable, with only two people running the ticket booth. And if standing in line for a half hour for a ticket was not bad enough, then waiting an hour for the concert to begin definitely was.

It is understandable that some circumstances may be beyond the control of those in charge of the entertainment, but I feel that our parents deserve a little more than what they received.

I heard that last year's entertainment, comedian Robin Williams, was crude and vulgar and many parents and students were very offended. Maybe a little better planning and screening of events is needed.

Many parents with young siblings had to drive home after the concert, and an hour delay did not make that any easier after a long day. The time spent with our parents is limited and special.

Maybe we should take more time planning that special "Parents Weekend."

BCS sets trend

To the Editor:

This correspondence is in response to the feature story in last week's Villanovan entitled, "Greeks' Dry Party a Success." It is encouraging to see that other student organizations have decided that it does not take "... a few drinks and a good 'buzz' to have fun ..."

The Vilianova Black Cultural Society (B.C.S.) has been sponsoring socials (parties) without alcohol for years. For example, last spring the B.C.S. sponsored a non-alcoholic Greek step show/social in which over 400 supporters from colleges and universities throughout the east coast attended this non-alcoholic function.

In fact, every social (party) sponsored by this group is without alcohol. For them, it is not a matter of putting their "... social budgets on the line ...," it is a matter of confidence in their ability to relate to others without using a substance to break the tension.

As far as setting trends "... for the future of Villanova's student social life ....," I think the B.C.S. is also a trend-setter.

Peer counseling expands; students to offer services

By MEGAN GUIDERA
Staff Reporter

The Career Planning and Placement Center experienced many changes this year. The name of the center changed from Career Development to Career Planning and Placement. The director changed from Dr. Robert Stokes to Nancy Dudak, and 14 shiny young faces joined the staff as peer counselors.

The one-year-old peer counselor program is moderated by Dave Leibig, a career counselor with the center. Leibig started the program in order to improve awareness of the Career Planning and Placement Center. It was felt that more reaching-out could transpire through students, with "peers" helping other students.

The peer counselors are students who were selected last spring through an interviewing process conducted by Leibig and his co-worker, Judy Madsen. These students exemplified qualities of leadership, motivation and confidence.

The peer counselors are made up of three seniors: Kim DiDonato, Julie Gargula, and Petra Hummelbrummer. The majority of the counselors are juniors: Marie Dancheck, John Guaragna, Megan Guidera, Joe Henry, Danny Leary, Lisa Mountain, Susan Richards and Shauna Quinn. Three sophomores are peer counselors also: Christine Arnold, Chris Jones and Christine Orr.

These students went through an extensive six-day training program prior to school to help them learn about the center's services and resources. The program included ice-breakers, slide shows and distinguished speakers.

One of the more valuable portions of the training program was a two-hour workshop given by Dr. Patricia McIntyre of the counseling center, on counseling skills, role plays and referral. This was McIntyre's second time participating in the program.

After the training program, the peer counselors became well acquainted with the center and its uses. The counselors are now qualified to help other students when they come to the center for guidance.

The peer counselors are capable of critiquing resumes, giving presentations to different organizations about the center and doing limited career counseling.

All 14 counselors are expected to spend five hours each week in the Career Planning and Placement Center answering questions, helping students or counseling.

Although the program was started last year with an experimental 10 peer counselors, the structure of the program has changed this year. The students are more organized and structured in their projects and jobs. More students are aware of the counselors' presence, and are more willing to talk to them, as opposed to last year.

Two students, Guaragna and Guidera, remain from the original 1987-88 peer counselor staff. Guaragna and Guidera serve as co-head peer counselors.

The Career Planning and Placement Center is located in the basement of Corr Hall. It is open to all students. The center offers career counseling, various workshops, the VALUE program, On-campus recruiting, resume critique, graduate school information, credentials files, practice interviews and many resources and information.

The Career Planning and Placement Center is useful to all students, and peer counselors can help one learn more about the center and how to use it.

Agency targets troubled teens

By KARLA BECKNER

Try to imagine living alone on the streets of Philadelphia at age 14, no home to go to, no family to turn to. This is a real problem for hundreds of youths in Philadelphia. Voyage House, Inc. was established in 1971 as a haven for these youths, as well as a counseling center for thousands of troubled teens.

"We provide free crisis intervention, emergency shelter and counseling to homeless, neglected, abused and runaway teenagers," said Rita Vance, executive director of Voyage House.

"If it's not a case of abuse, and it's all right with the teen, we call the family and invite them to a counseling session to reunite the youth with his or her family. If that's not possible we ask if there are any relatives or friends who will take the youth in so they can remain in a family environment."

Voyage House was the first program in Pennsylvania to provide emergency services exclusively to teens between the ages of 13 and 21. About 30 percent of its funding is received from the Federal Runaway and Homeless Youth Grant. The rest comes through donations from individuals, corporations, churches, community groups and foundations.

The program is run by six paid staff members and approximately 45 trained volunteers, including college interns. These people man the 24-hour telephone hotline, run the counseling sessions, provide meals, transportation and shelter to the homeless youth, and hold runaway prevention programs at 41 junior and senior high schools.

"The volunteers working with the program take the youths into their own homes to keep them off the streets," Vance said. "Currently we are trying to raise funds

Phila. to promote relations

By KAREN IOVINO
Staff Reporter

In recent months, public awareness of human rights has grown considerably. The Amnesty International tour, recently held in Philadelphia, has increased knowledge of the basic humanistic principles common to all people. Now, the chance to learn about and celebrate these rights is once again in our own backyard. October is Human Relations Month in the city of Philadelphia.

Coordinated by the Philadelphia Commission on Human Relations (PCHR), Human Relations Month will feature speakers, poetry readings, museum exhibits and other public events in the hopes of extending the message of human rights and relations to all.

According to Joe Farley, spokesman for the Commission, the purpose of Human Relations Month is "to promote inter-group harmony and awareness of laws prohibiting discrimination and to highlight the varied ethical groups in Philadelphia and how much they have contributed (to the city)."

In Philadelphia, events celebrating the theme of Human Relations Month are occurring almost daily. A Human Relations Sabbath will be held Oct. 7 to 9; a Human Rights Awards luncheon will be held on Oct. 13 at noon at the Wyndham Franklin Plaza Hotel; and a housing fair co-sponsored by the Philadelphia Office of Housing and Community Development is to be held on Oct. 15 at Broad and Master streets.

On Sunday, Oct. 16, an AIDS walkathon will be held to educate the public about the disease and to object to discrimination against AIDS. According to Farley, "It is illegal to discriminate against AIDS in Philadelphia because AIDS is considered a handicap, and it is unlawful to discriminate against a handicap. The commission will be walking and there will be an information table."

In this way the commission hopes to educate society about AIDS. The walk is a 12-kilometer pledge to raise money for AIDS services and education.

On Oct. 15, a rally will be held at 8:15 p.m. in Philadelphia on Seventh Street and the Parkway. The rally will focus on Jewish Soviet refuseniks and activists.

Keynote speakers will appear at 9 p.m. at the Philadelphia Museum of Art.

Tuesday, Oct. 25, features the first annual People Dance at the International House, Hopkinson Auditorium from 7 to 9 p.m. All are welcome, and those attending are asked to bring canned goods. This food will be donated to local Philadelphia food banks.

The ongoing events during October are there for the public to learn from and enjoy. Through Human Relations Month, the Philadelphia Commission on Human Relations hopes to fight discrimination, promote interracial harmony, increase public and media awareness of discrimination laws and educate the public on just who is protected under such laws, and where to go with a problem.

Farley concluded, "We encourage people to attend museums and exhibits across the city to expose themselves to different cultures."

The Pennsylvania State Education Association (PSEA), a pre-professional teaching organization, can give Villanova's future educators a jump on their future teaching careers. Villanova's PSEA chapter is actually of the National Education Association (NEA), which is the largest professional organization of practicing teachers in the United States.

This organization, which has existed at Villanova since 1937, is beneficial to all students interested in education. According to department of education and human services chairperson Dr. Henry O. Nichols, since the PSEA addresses many of the current issues which all professional teachers face today, PSEA members will benefit from having been exposed to these issues before beginning their teaching careers.

In addition, education majors and minors receive from the PSEA information regarding their particular academic majors, such as course requirements.

Also according to Nichols, Villanova PSEA members have in the past won statewide recognition for the publication of a newsletter. In addition, many PSEA officers have received scholarships, fellowships and assistantships for graduate study.

As is PSEA's tradition at Villanova, the organization will sponsor its annual dinner social in the Spring, honoring this past year's student teachers.

Nichols is extremely pleased with PSEA at Villanova, as he remarked, "Our department has been proud of the accomplishments of this organization through the years, as we especially are of the present group of officers. They have kept Villanova's tradition of quality and excellence by not only participating in the PSEA at the state level, but also by disseminating the valuable educational knowledge they receive to the rest of Villanova's future educators."

The PSEA has, in the past, brought speakers to campus who are professionals in the field of education to discuss such topics

Corps challenges to serve

By MARIA LOVETT
Staff Reporter

"Peace Corps ... the toughest job you'll ever love." But, exactly what type of job is the Peace Corps? On Sept. 28 Sherlene McCarther, Peace Corps recruiter, came to Villanova to answer that question and many others.

The Peace Corps is a government agency of the United States that places volunteers in communities of underdeveloped countries to live and work directly with the people, McCarther informed students at the meeting. Volunteers help nations overcome hunger, disease and poverty.

The Peace Corps has been assisting developing nations since 1961. Today there are 6,000 volunteers in 66 countries. The organization seeks men and women with adaptability, leadership and problem-solving skills.

There is a project for every student. The Peace Corps tries to match the skills a volunteer has with a country that needs them. Students with degrees in biology or a certain amount of science credits may have the opportunity to aid fishery projects. In Africa, volunteers are teaching farmers how to cultivate the fish [tilapia].

Business people and home economists are using their skills in the Dominican Republic. With their help, farmers improve crop storage and marketing, enrich seed variety and accommodate tools for local agricultural use.

Teachers, engineers, agriculturalists, health professionals and dozens of representatives from other fields are all needed by the Peace Corps.

"We find volunteers with general liberal arts backgrounds can be very useful as well," commented McCarther. "They are very flexible and trainable."

Once chosen by the organization, volunteers are committed to two years. The majority of the first year is training, learning the new language and preparing the project for the country. In the second year, volunteers indulge in their assignments. When they leave the country, they leave with the feeling of accomplishment. The volunteers have taught the local people how to survive with the resources they have.

Mike Delzotti, a Villanova senior, has applied to work with the Peace Corps. When asked why he is interested in the Peace Corps as a post-graduation work activity, Delzotti responded, "(The Peace Corps) will afford me an opportunity to do service in a very concrete way. It is a very special program in which you can gain experience that you would not find in any other program."

Delzotti is interested in pursuing construction or agricultural work with the Peace Corps. He hopes to be stationed in West Africa or the Caribbean.

Through their dedication, volunteers grow to know themselves and people of diverse cultures better. The Peace Corps gives people of this country the chance to expand their horizons and open their eyes to the way the majority of the world lives.

to open a 12-bed shelter facility in Philadelphia for those teens who have been on the streets for a longer period of time."

Statistics show that most of the teens served by Voyage House are between the ages of 13 and 17: 74 percent are female; 72 percent are minority; 54 percent are victims of physical or sexual abuse; 79 percent have extreme family problems; 61 percent have personal and emotional problems; 43 percent have school problems; and 40 percent attempt or consider suicide as a solution to their problems.

"We see teens from all over Philadelphia," Vance stated, "But larger percentages seem to come from the north and west sections of the city. We also see a great many from the northeast."

The Voyage House has been working for the past 17 years to help teens resolve their family and personal problems. The staff helps the youth and family consider options which may lessen the chance of runaway behavior, as well as reuniting families with runaways and strenghthening the family unit.

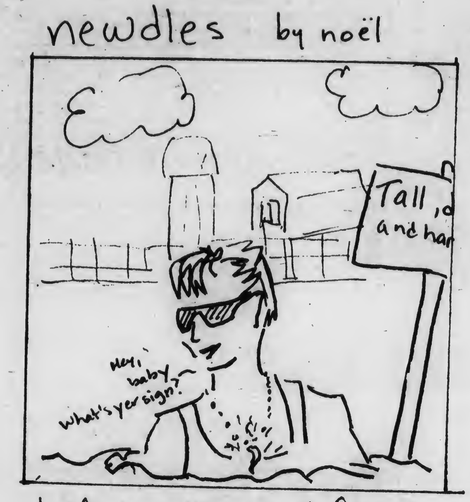
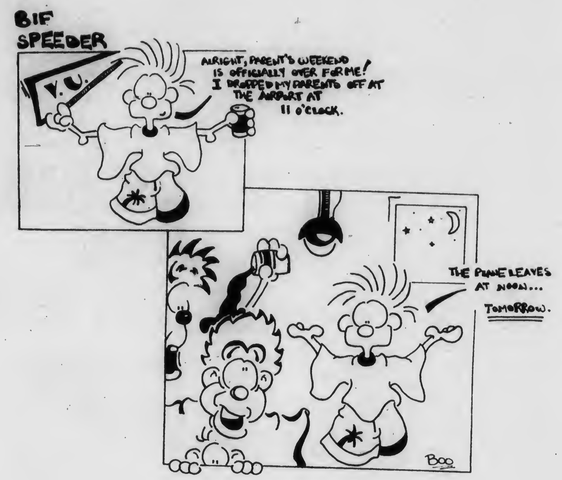
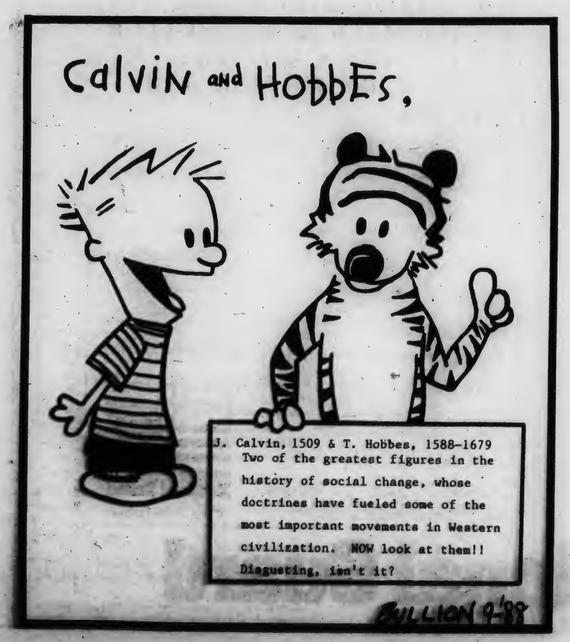
THE ART BIN







American "hero" overprices himself

By College Press Service

Lt. Col. Oliver North spent much of a recent speaking visit to Raleigh, N.C., listening to North Carolina State University students chant "Ollie Out of Raleigh." But even though North is in the midst of a lucrative nationwide lecture tour, the embattled Marine probably won't be coming near enough to college campuses to hear many similar taunts this fall, his agent reports.

It's not that North is afraid to tempt protesters or that campuses are afraid to hire North to speak. It's just that colleges and universities can't afford North's steep lecture fee.

"I've had at least 15 colleges inquire about Oliver North," said Bernie Swain of the Washington Speakers Bureau, which books North's lectures. "They just can't afford him."

The only school North is scheduled to appear at this fall is Boston College, Swain said, although he's ironing out plans to book North at "four or five other colleges."

Jeb Spencer, Boston College's lecture series coordinator, said BC's student government will pay $25,000 for North's lecture.

Colleges, Swain said, are perhaps the best public forums for North, although Swain says he has received about 90 inquiries about North speaking engagements in recent months.

"Colleges are much more willing to book someone involved in controversy than a corportion or a trade association," Swain explained. "It's just that his fee is high."

Some schools, in fact, want North precisely because he does evoke passions.

Boston College, Spencer said, "is an apathetic school, and we're hoping to get rid of that apathy by bringing North to campus."

"HOW I MADE $18,000 FOR COLLEGE BY WORKING WEEKENDS."

When my friends and I graduated from high school, we all took part-time jobs to pay for college.

They ended up in car washes and hamburger joints, putting in long hours for little pay.

Not me. My job takes just one weekend a month and two weeks a year. Yet, I'm earning $18,000 for college.

Because I joined my local Army National Guard.

They're the people who help our state during emergencies like hurricanes and floods. They're also an important part of our country's military defense.

So, since I'm helping them do such an important job, they're helping me make it through school.

As soon as I finished Advanced Training, the Guard gave me a cash bonus of $2,000. I'm also getting another $5,000 for tuition and books, thanks to the New GI Bill.

Not to mention my monthly Army Guard paychecks. They'll add up to more than $11,000 over the six years I'm in the Guard.

And if I take out a college loan, the Guard will help me pay it back—up to $1,500 a year, plus interest.

It all adds up to $18,000—or more—for college for just a little of my time. And that's a heck of a better deal than any car wash will give you.

THE GUARD CAN HELP PUT YOU THROUGH COLLEGE, TOO. SEE YOUR LOCAL RECRUITER FOR DETAILS, CALL TOLL-FREE 800-638-7600,* OR MAIL THIS COUPON.

Ensemble dances its way up

By CINDY CLEMENT
Staff Reporter

With an all-time high of 29 members, the Villanova Dance Ensemble's eighth season is well underway. The ensemble, whose repertoire includes ballet, modern, tap and jazz, has been steadily growing since its creation in 1980, and this year will be no exception.

On Sept. 13 and 15, 25 students attended open auditions in St. Mary's Auditorim. From this group, 12 women and two men were invited to join the troupe. According to senior Nancy Hensler, Ensemble president, this year's hopefuls were of the highest caliber the Dance Ensemble has ever seen.

Hensler is joined by fellow seniors Laura Adornetto and Meg O'Connell on the ensemble's executive board. At present, their most pressing task is to hire a new director. Two prospective candidates have been interviewed and the board hopes to make a decision soon.

In addition to seeking a new director, the members are currently working on sharpening and enlarging their body of repertoire pieces. The ensemble consistently keeps several numbers at performance quality. A performance quality piece is cast, costumed and staged with understudies available.

On Nov. 19, the curtain will go up on the second annual student choreography showcase. The performance, held in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center, is a chance for the ensemble to present their own choreography, costuming, lighting and staging to the Villanova community.

Last year's well-attended production featured 14 numbers danced to music from Madonna to George Winston to Elton John. Last year's creation of the showcase is an example of the ensemble's desire to demonstrate their remarkable increase in talent and ranks since its founding.

Although tentative at this time, the Dance Ensemble is interested in again attending the Northeastern Regional Dance Festival in Allentown. The festival is a weekend series of workshops, master classes and judgings of student choreography pieces, attended by many area universities.

The ensemble, which rehearses from 7:45 to 10 p.m. on Tuesdays and Thursdays in St. Mary's Auditorium, will see a change in leadership in January. The group of 26 women and three men will then be led by Marina Theodorous, president, Tricia DeAsis, vice president and Lauren Kerstetter, secretary. These officers were chosen in a Sept. 29 Dance Ensemble election.

In addition to its emphasis on current educational issues, Villanova's chapter of the PSEA has produced many outstanding officers who have exhibited leadership abilities at the PSEA state level. Currently, seniors Ann Marie Kaminski and Therese Cresanti, who are PSEA president and vice-president, respectively, at Villanova, both serve as co-presidents to the Southeast Region Coalition of Student Education Association.

Senior Susan Koennecke, treasurer of Villanova's PSEA, is also involved at the state level as secretary-treasurer of the Southeast Region.

Crowd supports Downey's views

By ALLEN AMBROSINO
Assistant Entertainment Editor

"Mort! Mort! Mort!" the crowd chanted as they eagerly awaited the arrival of talk show host Morton Downey Jr. at the Philadelphia Civic Center on Sept. 29. The crowd was full of typical Downey fans; the majority of whom were students from Villanova, Drexel, University of Pennsylvania and Temple. The beer was flowing freely as the crowd milled about anticipating the start of the festivities.

When he arrived, the crowd jumped to its feet and roared to welcome the unabashed host to Philadelphia. Downey proceeded to warm up the crowd with a few off-color jokes. He commented that he had just returned from Club Med vacationing with the Rev. Al Sharpton, the guest that Downey had shoved to the ground during a show over the summer.

Downey then turned his comments to the presidential elections, where he referred to George Bush as "Tweedle Dee" and Michael Dukakis as "Tweedle Dum." To the crowd's delight, he said Bush is the type of person that is "every woman's last husband" and Kitty Dukakis is "the woman you never want to marry."

As he did throughout the show, Downey included the audience by inviting a girl to sit with him at center stage. However, when he found out that she was only 16, he jumped away stating, "Just touching you makes me feel jail."

The controversial topic for this show was concerning the death penalty. As usual, Downey stocked his panel with people who disagreed with his popular stand of enforcing the penalty.

Hilton Stein and Ed Englehart were both attorneys who felt that everyone deserved legal representation even if they were admittedly guilty. Clifford Van Dyke was Downey's "yes" man as he continuously agreed with the outspoken host and the volatile crowd.

Because this was not an ordinary show, Downey decided to add a fourth chair to the panel and allow members of the audience to have a seat and voice their opinions. There were also "loudmouths" in three different locations surrounding the stage. This allowed all of the people who wanted to share their views the opportunity to be heard.

Stein and Englehart both felt that everyone deserves a fair trial according to the Constitution. Predictably, the crowd vehemently disagreed and hurled expletives at them during the entire show. Most of the comments at the loudmouth were so lewd, they cannot be conveyed without #$ taking the place of every other word.

Anyone who came to this Downey show expecting to learn more about the topic of the death penalty was disappointed. The only facts that were pertinent to the issue were that an average death-row prisoner is held seven-and-a-half years before the actual execution and it costs $44,000 tax dollars a year to keep them alive in jail during this time.

Halfway through the show, Downey attacked Stein, grabbing him by the shirt and out of his seat. However, Stein appeared to be laughing during this incident and it seemed as though it was planned just to incite the crowd. This was one of the most obvious examples that Downey has committed himself to entertaining his viewers instead of trying to get to the heart of the issues.

After a 10-minute intermission, Downey urged the crowd to introduce any controversial topic that they felt would be pertinent to the show's format. Immediately, several college students brought up the new drinking laws imposed in Pennsylvania, making it the strictest state in the country regarding alcohol.

At the loudmouth, comments ranged from "The new laws $#" to "I can go to Nicaragua and get killed in a war, but I can't have a $#*# glass of beer."

Downey had some ideas of his own. He felt that the government should implement a drug and alcohol sensitivity program that would offer classes to inform teenagers about the dangers of drugs and alcohol. Then, they would be given a card that would allow them to drink at age 18. Could you see any state in America accepting this proposal? Never.

After he permitted a few more students to berate the drinking laws, Downey deftly moved back to the death penalty issue. Reiterating an earlier point, Downey yelled at Stein, "No murderer that was ever executed has ever killed another person." By this time, whenever the lawyers attempted to speak, they were drowned out by the crowd.

One courageous audience member walked up to the loudmouth and openly disagreed with Downey. He talked about the teachings of Jesus Christ that you should "love your neighbor as yourself." He was then physically attacked by a Downey fan who felt that violence was the only way to express himself.

Although the show was entertaining, it was also a very scary example of mob mentality and the effects of shock journalism. Downey is able to twist facts into whatever he wants his audience to hear. Because of this, he gains power through them and it makes him invincible on his "home court."

People insult whomever disagrees with Downey's point of view because they know that the crowd will be with them. It is incredible that people who do not share the same views as Downey appear on his show. Don't they know that they will have no opportunity to make their point? Apparently, this fact does not matter to them as they throw themselves into the lion's den.

Downey once said that if his show ever became more than 10 percent entertainment, then he would retire. If this is true, he should never pick up a microphone again and should leave the talk show host profession forever.

Morton Downey Jr. brought his controversial show to the Civic Center on Sept. 29.

Run to see "Delancey"

By CHRIS WNUK
Staff Reporter

Consider the following scene. It is a Friday or Saturday night at Villanova. You and two of your friends are huddled around the TV set watching "Love Boat" reruns, eating pizza and drinking Coke. One of the trio assesses the scene and observes, "Guys (or girls), I think romance is dead." If this scenario depicts any weekend you have had in the past lifetime, turn off your TV and run, do not walk, to see "Crossing Delancey."

In "Crossing Delancey," Amy Irving plays Izzie Goldman, a 32-year-old literary sort, who lives in uptown New York and works in an upscale brookstore. Her parents have retired and moved to Florida, so she is very close to Bubbie (grandmother), played wonderfully by Reizl Bozyk.

Bubbie lives downtown and carries "Ed Koch for Governor" grocery bags. Although she is missing the majority of her teeth and has long since lost her youthful good looks, she frequently rhapsodizes about the days when she was "120 pounds of beautiful flesh and all the boys used to fight for my hand." Like most grandmothers, she sends Izzie home with care packages, gives her money and is obsessed about her granddaughter's marital status, or lack thereof.

While Izzie protests that the women of her generation are perfectly capable of having fulfilling lives without husbands, her protests fall on deaf ears. "No matter how much money you have, if you're alone, you're sick," is Bubbie's logic.

Frustrated at Izzie's attitude toward the alarming situation, Bubbie takes matters into her own hands. She and the local matchmaker, Hannah Mandelbaum (Sylvia Miles), arrange a dinner with Izzie and Sam Posner (Peter Riegert), proud owner of Posner's Pickles. Hannah is one of Susan Sandler's most colorful characters. She is a large, bleached blonde, brassy woman. The meals she shares with Bubbie, Izzie and Sam are memorable not because of her wit and companionship, but because of her obnoxious table manners. Bubbie and Hannah discuss Hannah's late husband while they eat a meal of chicken and mashed potatoes. The audience knows this not because the contents of the plates are in view, but because they are seen flying around Hannah's mouth as she answers Bubbie's question, "Did anyone ever find out why your husband jumped out the 16-story window?"

"No," Hannah replies (chew, gulp), "he wasn't around long enough to tell me."

Izzie, not up to a relationship with a merchant from the other side of Delancey, rebuffs Sam's offer of friendship. Before he leaves, he tells a story of his friend's experience when he trod across the boundaries of Delancey. Sam communicates the following message: You may be educated and have a fine job uptown, but your mind is as open as a merchant's shop on the Sabbath.

She dismisses this encounter and chooses to focus her attention on an author she knows from her bookstore. Anton Maes (Jeroen Krabbe) is artistic, educated, charming and cursed with creative genius. He is also involved with his assistant, a young college student.

While charmed by a birthday surprise from him, she continues to reject the idea of a friendship with Sam, who is not exotic, plays handball with the old men at his shop during lunch, speaks only English, and sells pickles for a living. She tries to set him up with one of her girlfriends and then finds herself disappointed when things appear to be going smoothly between them.

She jeopardizes her last opportunity to repair their relationship when she arrives late to Bubbie's where the three of them were to

Vasey theatre opens season

By LUCI A. JANKOWSKI
Staff Reporter

Villanova Theatre opened its season of plays, celebrating women through theatre, with the brilliant work of American female playwright, Carson McCullers. "The Member of the Wedding" is a touching comedy which focuses on a young Southern girl, coming to terms with herself during the awkward transition from childhood to adulthood.

In the opening scene, Frankie Addams (Megan Bellwoar), the play's young heroine, learns of her brother Jarvis' (Bolton Harris) engagement to Janice (Robin Lange). Immediately, Frankie is consumed by the excitement of the forthcoming wedding, which will take place in a few days. She is in awe of Jarvis and Janice and sees them in a totally different light than she did before. Frankie just cannot stop talking about the wedding; she is infatuated and mystified with the whole idea of love.

"There are so many things in this world I don't understand," Frankie said, referring to love, friendships, death and the transition she is going through. Frankie is almost 13, although she would like others to think she was going on 30. She thinks of herself as a grown lady, not as a child, yet she is still prone to play like a tomboy, throw tantrums and make statements like the one above, which reveals her vulnerability. Frankie is at that time in her life when she is experiencing severe growing pains, and she does not know how to deal with them.

Frankie's mother died when she was born and her father, Mr. Addams (Peter Thorworth), never pays attention to her. He is a stoic man, more interested in his business than in the young daughter who longs for his affection. Frankie's only brother Jarvis, whom she adores, is much older than she is and still thinks of Frankie as a little girl. She wants to relate to him on an equal level, but Jarvis continues to swing her around by the elbows and comment on how much she has grown. Frankie's cousin, John Henry West (Ian Westerfer), is five years younger, and is good to play with sometimes, but he just does not understand what she is going through.

The only person who seems to understand and accept Frankie for herself is Berenice Sadie Brown (Irma Mason), the family's black housekeeper. Berenice is mother-figure to Frankie, as well as a confidante and guide. She helps Frankie sort through some painful moments of youth by relating her own life experiences and wise advice. Although Frankie may not realize it, Berenice helps her by showing her that she is not alone and that she can make it through this difficult time. The memories that Berenice shares also seem to help her as much as they do Frankie; they are special ones which recall her not-long-forgotten younger days.

This is an excellent interpretation by director Andrew Belser, with superb performances by Mason and Bellwoar. The entire cast developed their characters well in the setting of the deep South so that one felt as if they were actually in Georgia. At times the Southern drawl was forgotten by actors in favor of their usual Northern speech, but the actors quickly remedied this as they realized it. This definitely is a "must see" play!

A&M records signs local band

By JEFF GILLIES
Assistant Entertainment Editor

If the only band that comes to mind when someone mentions local music in the Philadelphia area is Tommy Conwell and the Young Rumblers, something important is missing. That something is The Innocence Mission, a highly innovative, original quartet that is loaded with talent.

Led by singer/songwriter/keyboardist Karen Peris, The Innocence Mission have developed a unique style that landed them a major recording contract with A&M Records about a year ago. In a recent interview with Peris, she explained the style, the goals and the future of the band, which also consists of Mike Bitts, Steve Brown and Don Peris, who is also Karen's husband.

The road to success began when A&M's Patrick Clifford first heard the band's demo tape. He was so impressed, he called the band's lawyer from a pay phone at four in the morning. Asked if she was surprised by such an enthusiastic response, Karen replied, "Yes, that's one of the main reasons we went with A&M, because of his enthusiasm." The Innocence Mission expects to release their album sometime in 1989, "maybe in February," according to Peris.

The album should contain the same material that the band has been playing at the 23 East Cabaret for some time now. "We have all the songs and we have written a lot since the contract, so they are new." The band is currently in California working on the album, which they hope will see commercial success.

The music itself is not geared toward the charts. It has already been compared to so many different artists' that it is almost impossible to figure out which comparison is closest without listening to the band several times. Although Peris does not like to describe her own music, she admits influences range from Kate Bush to Peter Gabriel.

Peris herself has been the focus of the media's attention and has been compared to Bush, Aimee Mann, Stevie Nicks, Chrissy Hynde and many others. "If they're people that I like, it can be flattering and they're all so different so it's kind of confusing, but I think everybody just wants to be themselves," was Peris' response to whether she was bothered by all these comparisons.

During the course of the interview, Peris herself reflected the general image of the band. She had an air of innocence about her that made everything she said seem genuine and candid. Her appearance was quaint, and the excitement of the recording contract deal has not gone to her head. She seemed nervous at times, leaning her head against the knee she had raised upon her chair. Upon listening to the lyrics Peris writes, it becomes absolutely clear that her writing is a direct reference to the real person behind it. Perhaps this is what makes the Innocence Mission special.

The name of the band and the writing are not related by accident. Peris feels the word innocence has a certain magical quality about it. "The name we kind of see as a place that you could go to and all your childhood dreams would be there." For Peris, the word innocence denotes the strength and purity that shines through in her music, much like in the way it shines through in talking with her.

As for the future of the band, their main concern for now is to "make the best album we can." Peris hopes to tour as a supporting act for someone else and hopefully, gain a following in Europe by touring there. The concentration is mainly on the music, not anything else, which is a rarity in the business today.

The Innocence Mission should be around for a long time to come. The originality and quality of their music, along with the genuine sentiment behind it almost guarantees they will not be a flash in the pan. If you get the chance, see them before they start playing the major venues such as the Spectrum; it may take some time, but it is a safe bet that is where they are headed.

"Delancey" is delightful have dinner. Instead of going directly to her grandmother's, she follows her beguiling author-friend home to review his manuscripts. Does she find Sam waiting for her? That would be telling.

"Crossing Delancey" is not a flawless movie, for it contains a few implausible scenarios. For example, why is Izzie so blind for so long to such a good thing?

Sandler more than compensates for this minor distraction with her brilliant characterization. Her characters do not suffer from "Cream of Wheat" disease (i.e. bland, inoffensive and forgettable). She sculpts them clearly by making them simple and real. It is through the summation of small, shining scenes that she transforms this unadorned plot into a great movie.

Riegart's interpretation of Sam deserves a special note. Sam could have easily been portrayed as a sincere but sopoforic shopkeeper. Riegart steers clear of that by revealing the vulnerability in his character. Describing the feeling he had before their first date, he says, "I was so excited, I couldn't think of anything else. I kept making wrong change all day." Riegart portrays Sam as uneducated, but not without intellect, aware of what he has and who he is, namely someone not afraid to look at life beyond the boundaries of Delancey Street.

If the theme of this movie had to be written in a word, it would be serendipity. Within a simple story, Sandler weaves many delightful and heartwarming surprises.

ABC employs "Mission"

By STEPHEN POWERS
Staff Reporter

Watch for the ratings race at 8 p.m. on Sunday nights to turn into a three-way battle at the end of this month, when ABC's revival of "Mission: Impossible" goes head-to-head with CBS' extremely popular "Murder, She Wrote" and the "Family Ties"-"Day by Day" combo on NBC.

The new "Mission" is based on the adventure series that ran on CBS from 1967—73. Although ABC had planned to re-film old scripts during the writers' strike, brand-new stories have been written and are being filmed on location in Australia. Peter Graves, a member of the original Impossible Missions Force, will return as Jim Phelps, but will be joined by a new cast of relative unknowns. "Mission" will remain on the air at least until January, when, depending on its performance, it could be bumped by the strike-delayed "A Fine Romance."

NBC hopes that a visit by "Family Ties" cast members to the "Day by Day" set will help strengthen the second-season sitcom, which is done by the same people who produce "Ties." Steven Keaton (Michael Gross) will leave his son Andrew (Brian Bonsall) at the "Day" child-care center while he is on a business trip, and Andrew will like it so much that he will want to stay.

Also on "Day" this season: look for the child-hating Eileen, nicely played by "Saturday Night Live" alumnus Julia Louis-Dreyfus, to have a bigger role. She will employ the teenaged Ross (Christopher Daniel Barnes) at her brokerage firm, and will move into the house next door to the center, giving her an excuse to drop by more often.

"Ties," which has been on the wane over the past year, will begin its final season with a dramatic turn — Steven will suffer a heart-attack and undergo open-heart surgery in a one-hour episode. In later episodes, Alex and Mallory (Michael J. Fox and Justine Bateman) will experience "dramatic life-style changes." Although the two oldest Keaton children were supposed to have moved to New York this year, those plans have been scrapped.

"Murder, She Wrote," which is firmly seated in the Nielsen Top 10, understandably will be making as few changes as possible. However, Cabot Cove will get a new sheriff, since Tom Bosley has left the show for his own NBC mid-season replacement series.

HE'S FINISHED "MOONLIGHTING": "Moonlighting" is losing the creative genius who made the show a hit. Glenn Gordon Caron, the show's creator and executive producer since it debuted in 1985, has left the ABC series to direct feature films, the first of which was this summer's critically acclaimed "Clean and Sober."

Some believe Caron's departure means that series star Cybill Shepherd has won her longtime, and much-publicized, feud with him. Shepherd reportedly got into heated arguments with Caron because she thought her Maddie Hayes character was becoming too shrewish, and those disagreements contributed to "Moonlighting's" numerous production delays.

While Caron is credited for the terrific plots and witty banter of the early episodes, he is also at least partially responsible for the show's creative decline over the last few years.

Jay Daniel, the program's co-executive producer for the past two seasons, is replacing Caron and hopes to turn the show around by putting less emphasis on David and Maddie's relationship and focusing more on their detective work.

ALF TALKS: NBC's "ALF" is the latest personality to join the late-night talk show wars. Well, sort of.

In an hour-long episode to air Oct. 24, ALF will fill in for Johnny Carson on "The Tonight Show." The show, which was actually taped in the "Tonight" studio, will feature Carson regulars Ed McMahon, Tommy Newsome and the NBC orchestra. ALF's guests include Dr. Joyce Brothers, impressionist Rich Little and the San Diego Zoo's Joan Embry, a frequent Carson guest.

This will not be ALF's first time hosting a talk show. Last season, he dreamed he was filling in for David Letterman and interviewed "Hogan Family" star Sandy Duncan.

SHORT TAKES: Julianne Phillips, Bruce Springsteen's estranged wife, just wrapped "Seven Hours to Judgment," in which she plays the wife of a kidnapped judge. Beau Bridges directed and starred with her . . . The third installment of the Indiana Jones series finally has a release date. "Indiana Jones: The Last Crusade," starring Harrison Ford and Sean Connery, opens next May 22 . . . Richard Dreyfuss, Martin Sheen and Emilio Estevez have agreed to star in TV movies for the new Turner Network Television (TNT). Sheen and son will do a film about nuclear testing, while Dreyfuss will do a profile of Ulysses S. Grant.

Videos limit originality

By MICHAEL AIMETTE
and BILL CARR
Staff Reporters

For What It's Worth

The popularity of video music is the most evident reason for the downfall of rock and roll in the '80s. While many consider videos to be an art form, they really only serve to force-feed the band's intentions to the listener/viewer and all but eliminate imagination and personal interpretations of songs. Regardless of the quality of the video, one is left with the equal impression of two separate entities: the video and the music. But should they be equal? Of course not. Musicians make music, not movies. If a band makes music, they "miraculously" become actors; if they do not oblige to make a video, they simply cannot be commercially successful musicians.

A good example of this involuntary interpretation is seen in R.E.M.'s latest video, "Talk About The Passion," from their first album, Murmur, and subsequently re-released on their greatest hits compilation, Eponymous. The video conveys the bleak message of the existence of poverty while our government wastes money on weaponry. While its intentions are quite good, its message is hardly evident in the actual song. In fact, the song (first released five years ago) was originally intended for personal interpretation all along, according to lead singer Michael Stipe — not forcing one to envision nuclear warships and poverty and politics.

The point is that too much emphasis is placed on videos; they undermine the content of the song. Actual songwriting skill is forsaken in order to parade the best-looking or most marketable group. This observation may help explain the lack of originality in much of today's music; "imitation" bands emulating dedicated musicians such as Led Zeppelin, Eric Clapton, and, until recently, Aerosmith, keep springing up in the Top 40.

Obviously, videos are here to stay. Despite MTV's dwindling ratings, the video format is the single most effective promotion for rock and roll musicians. Not to contradict this article, but there are also some excellent videos on MTV. Hopefully, however, the visual aspect will take its proper position as a secondary role in video music and let the music do the talking.

Del Fuegos Interview

The Del Fuegos brought their brand of straight-forward rock and roll to the 23 East Cabaret in Ardmore last Thursday night. The Boston-based band played a strong, energetic 90-minute set for a modest, yet enthusiastic crowd.

Since their last album, Stand Up, The Del Fuegos have undergone some substantial "regrouping." The new incarnation of the Fuegos includes a new lead guitarist, who replaces Warren Zanes, brother of lead vocalist Dan Zanes, and a new drummer who looks and plays like that drummer from Cheap Trick.

So what is new with The Del Fuegos, you ask? True, The Fuegos have been pretty silent since the much-anticipated, but ultimately disappointing, Stand Up. Well, some lucky reporters managed to find their way backstage after the concert and converse with Dan Zanes, gathering some interesting information.

The Fuegos are in the process of recording a new album. Dan Zanes seems fairly sure it will get the band back on the track of their second album, Boston, Mass., which won widespread acclaim for its bare-bones, garage rock approach. On Stand Up, according to Zanes, the band got cocky, rushed production, and wrote the album primarily as a reaction against annoying fans who kept saying, "I love your sound — you'll never use synthesizers, will you?"

Zanes seems to have learned a valuable lesson from the last album. He told the reporters, "Maybe an album shouldn't be made if it's reactionary and not from the inside."

Judging from the show, The Del Fuegos seem to have weathered their personnel changes and appear ready to make another, smarter, drive toward mass success. Any last words about what to expect from the forthcoming album from Mr. Zanes? Only this: "Whatever it is, that's what it is."

NEW STUFF

Three notable releases this week: The first is a six-song live EP from those sloganeering rockers from Wales, The Alarm. The album was recorded from a recent performance in The Center of Performing Arts in Boston . . . Keith Richards released his first solo album, entitled Talk Is Cheap, and features drumming by Steve Jordan, of "Late Night with David Letterman" fame . . . They Might Be Giants released their second album of whimsical tunes, called Lincoln. It sports their hot new single, "Shoehorn With Teeth." Draw your own conclusions . . .

Provocative new magazine hits newsstands

By ROBERT DUGGAN
Staff Reporter

Smart is the new quarterly magazine featuring some of the finest writers around covering the arts, politics and modern life in general in all its quirks and ironies.

Terry McDonell, president and editor-in-chief of the magazine, said Smart's "plan is to bring together the best writers in the country to cover the people and ideas most influencing creative life as many of us are trying to live it — that is, with wit and a sense of irony. Nothing doctrinaire or elitist or postmodern artsy-craftsy, just as much thought-provoking stuff as we can round up each issue."

McDonell's plan is fulfilled by the quality writing in the first issue. Smart, however, has much of the feel of an intellectual's Rolling Stone at times, when the balance between high-brow and hip tips in the hip direction.

The first concession to commercialism is the devilish grin of Jack Nicholson gracing the cover, a safe and understandable marketing move for a new magazine. The article by Lynn Hirschberg, who also contributes to Rolling Stone, makes up for the hipness of her subject, however, with a well written analysis of the personal philosophy of the star using his own views on the famed Nicholson attitude.

The second concession is the adapted extract from Jay McInerney's soon-to-be-published novel, Story of My Life. McInerney, author of Bright Lights, Big City and one of the designated "voices of the '80s," submits another brief fictional glimpse into life in the fast lane that he's built his career on. His inclusion is a commercial play of the first degree.

Aside from these two moves, the magazine contains some very fine writing. One very well-written piece is taken from a work in progress by George Plimpton about Truman Capote. The piece, called "A Profile in Eight Voices: Truman Capote," uses interviews with such friends of Capote's as John Huston and Kurt Vonnegut to present a very beautiful and revealing portrait of the controversial author.

Hunter S. Thompson, maverick political analyst, submits "A Man Without A Country," a recollection of the long battle he has had with George Bush. Thompson pulls no punches in this biting diatribe. "Bush," Thompson writes, "has the instincts of a dung beetle. No living politician can match his talent for soiling himself in public."

The showcase piece of the premiere issue is an adaption from My Traitor's Heart, an upcoming book by Rian Malan. Malan is an Afrikaner reporter who has been in self-imposed exile since 1977. His piece is called "The Curse of the Hammerman." The Hammerman was Simon Mpungose, a black who serially killed four white South Africans in 1984.

Malan writes, "The Hammerman murders raised the specter of indiscriminate retribution; they forced whites to examine their lives and the structure of their society, and when they did so, they saw that they were not without sin and could not escape complicity." This story looks at the terrible reality of apartheid in a disturbing and unforgetable new way.

Smart has many more incisive articles on the media, art, food, fashion, photography, travel and architecture. All the articles are complemented by photography in the same intelligent, smirking style found throughout the prose.

When Tom Waits was described as "more than a little Beat and looking over his shoulder at Brecht", it became clear that Smart was a unique, if not slightly pretentious magazine. If you hunger for the mentally provocative in an eclectic package, Smart looks like a promising place to find your answer now and in the future.

Classic LP re-released

By GJ DONNELLY
Staff Reporter

Although many groups have aspired to change the course of rock music, few have been as successful at it as the Yardbirds. They were the harbingers of heavy metal rock, perfecting both the manic in concert jam (rave-up) and the malestrom of guitar wizardry.

It is for the latter accomplishment that this innovative group is most lauded. Not surprising, considering that their lead guitarists were, in chronological order, Eric Clapton, Jeff Beck and Jimmy Page. Thus the band provided a veritable laboratory for the guitar playing of the best axe-wielders in British rock music.

Rhino Records now presents the first official U.S. pressing of the Yardbirds' classic first LP, "Five Live Yardbirds," featuring Eric "Slowhand" Clapton on guitar.

Recorded live at the Crawdaddy Club in London 1964 (where the Yardbirds had just taken over residency from the Rolling Stones), "Five Live Yardbirds" is a raw, intense set of blues standards taken to new heights by the band's improvised rave-ups.

After a quick introduction, the Yardbirds throw themselves into a frenetic version of Chuck Berry's "Too Much Monkey Business," featuring two siren-like Clapton solos backed by Chris Dreja's rampant rhythm guitar.

Slim Harpo's "Got Love if You Want it" gets the treatment next as singer Keith Relf leaps to the fore with an enthusiastic vocal and a wheezing blast of sound from his harp, which drowns a formidable accompaniment from the rest of the group.

Relf defers to the vocal stylings of Clapton and bassist Paul Samwell-Smith for "Goodmorning Little Schoolgirls," a raucous little rocker propelled by "Slowhand's" guitar and the incessant howl of Relf's harmonica.

Bo Diddley's "Pretty Girl" and John Lee Hooker's "Louise" offer other enthusiastic Yardbird performances, with Jim McCarty's drums laying down a roughshod beat. They are also platforms for Relf's off-the-cuff singing style, a juxtaposition of blues music addition and pure fun.

The LP's apex comes with the nest track, Diddley's "I'm A Man." It is the tightest number on the album, as Relf and Clapton (on harp and guitar, respectively) duet at warp speed while McCarty pounds out a drum sound similar to a cattle drive.

The finale, the aforementioned "Here 'Tis," is another Yardbird showstopper. Relf's howling vocal and relentless tambourine banging ignites the song's inherent power, while the rhythm section of McCarty and Samwell-Smith provide a dual bass/drum solo. Then Clapton and Dreja's guitars duet with McCarty and Samwell-Smith and the song finishes abruptly, leaving the audience dumbfounded.

Although the word awesome is nowadays associated with just about anything that seems vaguely worthwhile, the Yardbirds were awesome in the truest sense. The first of all heavy metal groups also broke ground with their Gregorian chant "Still I'm Sad," influencing groups like Pink Floyd. They broke up in 1968, leaving Page with the name and an upcoming tour of Scandinavia (which was fulfilled by the "New" Yardbirds who became Led Zeppelin.

The Yardbirds were not the most commercially successful of groups.

A well-packed anthology of their career would be a valuable contribution to any fan's library, no matter what the cost. Despite their relative obscurity however, they still influence thousands of young musicians — if not through their own work, then in the work of the groups they helped to spawn; Led Zeppelin, Cream, Jeff Beck Group and Renaissance among them.

Record Roundup. . .Siouxsie, Iggy Pop

By JOHN CARR
Staff Reporter

Peep Show, the new Siouxsie and The Banshees album, combines smooth, harmonious synthesizers and thundering percussion to yield exceptional rhythms accented with significant, flavorful lyrics. All of the songs were written by either Siouxsie Sioux (lead vocals) or Steven Severin (electric bassist). From the upbeat mix of "Peek-A-Boo," the widely recognized single off the album, which is currently receiving a great deal of play in dance clubs; to "The Last Beat of My Heart," a lofty, sweet ballad, Peep Show provides a variety of songs guaranteed to please even the most discriminating music critic.

Aside from "Peek-A-Boo," the first side of Peep Show relies heavily on fast-paced keyboard rhythms and richly blended percussions and drums. In "Scarecrow," debatably the best single on the album, Siouxsie really gives a clean, crisp vocal performance which is accentuated by the music rather than drowned out, as can be the case on many new wave techno-pop albums. Another song on the album, "Carousel," paints a frightening portrait of the amusement ride as seen through a small child's eyes. In this song, the temperate sounds of the accordian illicit childhood memories of the pungent sights and sounds that accompany such frivolity.

Finally, Siouxie and The Banshees deviate from the norm in an ironically fun-loving tune titled "Burn Up." The lyrics and tone are full of satirical allusions to childhood nursery rhymes, lost innocence, and a deadly nuclear holocaust which scorches the land; the song flows like a runaway steam train with the resilient hum of a harmonica in the background.

The second side of Peep Show is filled with various beats and lyrical context. If "Rawhead and Bloodybones" sounds like an imitation of "Bedbugs and Ballyhoo," a previously successful tune by Echo and the Bunnymen, the similarity stops there. It is a slow, methodical tune in which Siouxsie really exercises her vocal abilities and in doing so, bears a striking similarity to Laurie Anderson. In "Turn to Stone," echoes are brilliantly orchestrated into the song to produce an uncanny effect. It has an infectious rhythm and booming bass lines.

Siouxsie and The Banshees manage to stir up melancholic images without sacrificing vibrancy and uniqueness in their musical style. Peep Show is an album full of thoughts that breathe and words that burn.

Soul Asylum
Hang Time
A & M

Comparisons are inevitable. An aggressive garage-rock quartet from the city of Minneapolis is bound to be compared to two critically favored successes in that genre: The Replacements and Husker Du. That is the case with this third standout band from Minneapolis (discounting Prince), Soul Asylum, whom Rolling Stone magazine labeled "A young foursome with the makings of an Eighties punk-rock Who." Regardless of whom they sound like, their newest album Hang Time, lives up to its impressive reviews. Like The Replacements and Husker Du, Soul Asylum began their career playing loud, fast, and sloppy, but have honed their skills enough to make an insightful, even evocative, album.

The evolutionary process was slow for Soul Asylum; the band has weathered personnel changes and a temporary breakup since their formation in 1983, yet the leader of the band, guitarist, vocalist, and only songwriter Dave Pirner has persevered. Also, like The Replacements, Soul Asylum kicked around the club scene for years; which accounts for their wild stage antics and impromptu "covers" in concert — certainly a refreshing change from today's predictable, choreographed shows. Though Soul Asylum does not quite match either The Replacements or Husker Du in terms of songwriting skill, Hang Time is the sign of a maturing band on its way to great things.

Nothing's Shocking
Jane's Addiction
Warner Brothers Records

Jane's Addiction has been labeled by many as "the greatest thrash band to come out of Los Angeles." Listening to their major-label debut, Nothing's Shocking, would lead the listener to believe otherwise. While they are truly great, they are not a thrash band.

"Ocean Size" is the song from the album presently receiving airplay from college stations. With its blaring guitar and heavy backbeat, it is indicative of the album's first side. However, Side 2 opens with the ethereal ramblings of singer/lyricist Perry Farrell in "Summertime Rolls." Farrell's voice is one of the most interesting around. He sounds like an instrument slightly out of tune, but still incredibly listenable. Horns embellish the hard-driving "Idiots Rule," while there are surprising jazz influences apparent on "Thank You Boys." The songs range from the mellow carelessness of "Jane Says" to the brilliant, defiant closing tune, "Pigs in Zen."

While they are truly great, they are not a thrash band.

Aside from Farrell's superior lyric writing, the album is packed with guitar work by David Navarro that grabs the listener and does not let go. Bassist Eric A. supplies very imaginative bass patterns held together by the sturdy drumming of Stephen Perkins. Jane's Addiction is definitely a band with everything going for them, so do not let the overused "thrash" label scare you away. Jane's Addiction is a band with something for everyone.

Instinct
Iggy Pop
A & M
*½

Seeing Iggy Pop for the first time over the summer was such an overwhelming pleasure that hearing his newest recording could only be a letdown. During the live show, the Iggy-as-Punk-Grandad myth melded perfectly with the wall of sound that his band was; on his album Instinct, however, the spell is broken.

From the first sounds heard out of Steve Jones' (ex-Sex Pistols) guitar on the opening "Cold Metal," it is fairly easy to tell what the Pop agenda is going to sound like: buzz-saw guitar that Jones could play in his sleep, tired vocals, worthless drumming.

This album has got the lock on the "Most Apathetic Album of the Year" title.

This album has got the lock on the "Most Apathetic Album of the Year" title; considering the quality of Iggy Pop's past recordings, particularly his first album with the Stooges and his own Lust for Life album, this record shows Pop wearing out his welcome.

On songs like "Easy Rider" and "Power and Freedom" the band is tight, but Pop is not up front. Trite, jaded-rocker lyrics saturate this album and send him packing. Do not be mistaken — Iggy Pop is a rock icon no matter what. But this record more than proves that he is primarily a showman, and not much of a songman.

Pete Lombardi leads Wildcats

By DOUG SCANCARELLA
Sports Editor

Four short years ago, newly appointed Villanova football Head Coach Andy Talley and his staff were faced with a huge task. This task was to build a football team from a program which had been dormant for five years.

The first step in this task was no secret. Talley and his staff had to sign recruits, a lot of recruits. Talley came up big in this department in his first year inking 25 high school superstars.

Some of these players developed into stars at Villanova. Now, as seniors, some of these players have become the nucleus of the V.U. football team.

One such player which the team revolves around is starting fullback Pete Lombardi. Lombardi, a 6-foot-1 fullback, has been an integral part of the Wildcat attack since arriving at V.U. in 1985. He now starts at fullback, a position where he gained 113 yards in the Cats 20-14 win over Yankee Conference rival Rhode Island last Saturday.

I will really miss him next year because he is a player that will do whatever you tell him whether it run, pass, or block

- head football coach Andy Talley

"Pete is a clutch player we love to go to," Talley said, "He is a lunch pail-type worker that opens things up for us. He is a very hard worker and a great player."

Lombardi is indeed a great player, and he has been doing it his whole career at Villanova. After graduating from North Bergen High School in New Jersey, where he earned three varsity letters at running back and linebacker, he made an immediate impact at Villanova.

In his freshman year he started in three of five games and finished as the team's fourth leading rusher.

The next two years brought more of the same for Lombardi. Starting in one game as a sophomore, he finished third on the team in rushing. While starting nine times as a junior, he also finished third in rushing.

As a senior, Lombardi has established himself as the team's primary fullback. As of now, he is second in rushing behind starting tailback Jeff Dingle.

"Pete is an outstanding fullback at this level," Talley said. "I will really miss him next year because he is a player that does whatever you tell him, whether it is run, pass or block."

"My goal is to do whatever I can to help this team win," Lombardi said. "I concern myself with doing my job and getting my assignment down."

As a senior and a leader, Lombardi's hard work ethic has trickled its way down through the entire team, and the result is a Wildcat 3-1 record, 2-0 in the Yankee Conference.

"Pete gives us that much needed toughness in our finesse offense. He is a player we cannot do without," Talley concluded.

Hawks' pressure and "never-surrender" attitude.

"St. Joe's is an aggressive team and they're not going to sit back for anything," stated Massaro. "It doesn't matter what the score is, they'll just keep coming right at you with their aggressiveness."

The Wildcats managed to find a crack in the wall of pressure and went on a scoring spree of three goals in five minutes late in the game. Courtney Bova, Tory Rife and Paolantonio each directed the ball to the back of the St. Joseph's net, bringing the score to its final position of 6-0.

schools in the Big East in order to find an answer to this question.

Seton Hall's package includes 16 games (8 at the Brendan Byrne Arena) for $50. Boston College has 14 games for $50. Connecticut charges $75 for 17 games (12 at the Hartford Civic Center).

Georgetown offers 14 games for $60. Providence has a package of 18 basketball games and 17 hockey games for only $50.

Pittsburgh, the so-called "bad guys," offer tickets to students at no charge upon presentation of a student I.D. card.

It does not take a genius to start to wonder why the ticket prices are so high at Villanova. My question is just how much of the total basketball revenue can come from student ticket sales?

With the lucrative television contracts, regular ticket sales, tournament revenues, and all the other sources of financial good fortune that are associated with a successful basketball program, why must the students pay so much in ticket prices. After all, when we get right down to it, the basketball team is a part of the student body at Villanova and without the presence of that student body, there would be no team.

The time has come to evaluate this situation and take some action before it is too late. Being able to support your team and show school spirit is vital to any college and should not be considered a luxury.

Athlete of the Week

RON KLOS

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is Ron Klos, the goalie of the Villanova soccer team.

Klos, a senior, shutout St. Joseph's last Friday to give the Wildcats a 1-0 victory over their Big East rivals. The 1-0 win gave Klos his 12th career shutout making him V.U.'s all-time shutout leader in men's soccer.

In the victory, Klos recorded 12 saves while not allowing a single goal in two, 10-minute overtime periods.

"Ron is a hard worker and a really good goalie. He is a tremendous asset to this term," Wildcat Soccer Head Coach Chris Jones said.

Women's soccer

By KATHY BIELOMYZA

Mention the term 'away game' to the Villanova women's soccer team and watch their faces cringe and their spines shudder. Foreign fields have not been good to the Cats.

On Sept. 29, the squad travelled to the University of Maryland to play their sixth consecutive match on the road against the host Terrapins, and once again the outcome was dismal.

Villanova dominated the offensive game, outshooting the 'Terps 16-4, but was unable to find the back of the net. Freshman Kim Brickner led the Cats attack with three shots on goal, while seniors Ann Beirne and Jean Hajjar each added two.

Although 'Nova held a 6-2 advantage in corner kicks, they were unable to capitalize on several scoring opportunities and dropped the 3-0 decision. It was the Cats' fourth shutout of the season.

Head Coach Don Paxson is not disappointed with his team's efforts and feels that the players are improving with each game. Changes have been made in the Wildcats front line and midfield, and Paxson "wouldn't expect anything to suffer," but hopes that the offense will now come together. The normally powerful Villanova offense has tallied just four goals this season.

The Cats, eager to end their losing streak, will be in action on Oct. 5, against Princeton in their 1988 home opener.

Oct. 7 through Oct. 9, the club will participate in the W.A.G.S. Tournament at Rutgers where they will face a tough George Mason squad.

Rugby rips rival

By JOHN R. LEARY and CARLO DINOTA
Staff Reporters

The Villanova Rugby Club christened its first home game of the fall season on Oct. 1 with a crushing 25-4 victory over Drexel at the Morris Estates. The defending Eastern Pennsylvania Champions have now improved their record to 2-0.

Outside center John Leary scored within five minutes of the opening kickoff, grabbing a stray ball and dashing 35 meters for 'Nova's first points. Villanova then capitalized off a line-out in Drexel territory, with captain Brian Coughlin intercepting a Dragon throw-in and barreling through for a second score.

In an excellent display of second-phase rugby, 'Nova attacked again with clean backrow action off a midfield scrimmage, which led eventually to fullback Joe McGrady's short gallop for the third unanswered try of the half. Despite the glaring sun and high temperature, Nova was relentless.

Scrum-half Tom Jadico darted weakside off a scrummage in 'Nova territory, and kicked into high gear with a 55-meter run for a score.

Villanova's hard-hitting, aggressive defense held the Drexel Dragons to only four points, which came early in the second half. In a half which lacked the excitement of the previous 40 minutes, Coughlin's diving deflection of a kick in the Drexel end zone was enthusiastically received by the large Parent's Weekend crowd.

The following five-meter scrummage produced 'Nova's final score of the afternoon, with Carlo DiNota carrying the ball in for a try.

The Villanova B-side overwhelmed an inferior Drexel squad, 42-0.

The women's volleyball squad fell to Georgetown and Pennsylvania last week as their record fell to 3-12.

Volleyball spiked in three by "Best of Philadelphia"

By MONICA BYRNE
Staff Reporter

The overall season record of the women's volleyball team is 3-12, but it is not indicative of the team's hard work, dedication or perseverence. The Cats have been on the road every weekend since they started their season on Sept. 9, but they fortunately do not have to travel this weekend.

On Sept. 27, 'Nova journeyed to Georgetown for yet another away match. Despite the offensive attacks of Lisa Stephanovic, Sheila Duffy and Andrea Perez, the Hoyas beat the Wildcats in three games, (8-15, 13-15, 4-15).

Licking their wounds, the Cats then traveled to Maryland on Oct. 1, and played a very impressive match. According to Coach Dave Barkley, Nova was just "outplayed," falling 12-15, 15-2, 3-15 and 3-15.

The spikers' most recent outing was on Oct. 2, at the Palestra in Philadelphia, where they matched up with the University of Pennsylvania. Temple and LaSalle to decide the "Best of the Big Five."

At 1 p.m., 'Nova took the court against the eventual city champ, U. Penn. Playing an aggressive game led by captain Debbie Opitz and Perez, combining for 15 kills, the Cats fell to the Quakers 6-15, 5-15 and 9-15.

At 3 p.m. Villanova squared off against Temple in what would prove to be its most exciting match of the day. Capturing the first game, 15-11 under the solid serving of freshman Jennifer Neville and the fine net play of Perez and Duffy, 'Nova was off to a promising start.

In game two, Hillary Anderson took control, but the Cats could not overcome the relentless Owls, and dropped the game 11-15. Once again, in the third game, V.U. reached for victory, but fell short 16-18, despite the powerful serving of Neville and Maggie Fischer.

Trailing two games to one, 'Nova gave everything it had, but it was not enough. Temple secured its win, beating 'Nova, 15-5 in the fourth game, during which Jill Beiter, Perez and Stephanovic all gave commendable performances.

At 6:30 p.m., in the last match of the day, Villanova defeated LaSalle 15-9, 15-4, 13-15 and 15-6. In their third game loss, Barkley was busy trying new line-ups to possibly find a "winning combination."

Overall Coach Barkley was very pleased with his team's performance this past weekend and with the fact that one of his players, Stephanovic, was named to the All-City tournament team. He said, "Lisa probably played her best match of the season against LaSalle."

Looking back, Barkley felt that against U. Penn, his team "gave up too much of a lead in the beginning, but played real hard at the end" and against Temple, just "ran out of gas at the end." But we "broke the (losing) streak" he emphasized.

Looking ahead, the spikers will be playing LaSalle again this week, but until then, they will be working on "blocking and finishing the game strong."

Defense spurs Gridmen past Rams

By JOHN G. RICCO
Sports Editor

The Villanova football team has, in the past three years, come to be known as a run and gun, offensive-minded squad. Though Saturday's 20-14 victory over Rhode Island (2-2) may not change that title, it should serve notice to the rest of the Yankee Conference that Villanova (3-1) possesses a capable defensive unit as well.

"I thought all the time as we progressed and got better that at some point and time our defense would have to come to town, and they were going to have to win some games for us," said Head Coach Andy Talley. "They were going to have to play well on a day when we didn't have a lot going for us offensively."

Last Saturday was just such a day.

"I credit our defense," Talley continued. "If they didn't play well today, we would have lost."

Indeed, in a game URI Head Coach Bob Griffin called "a defensive battle," the 'Nova defense rose to the occasion. They forced two third-quarter fumbles which led to 10 points, all that V.U. would score in the second half.

In addition, they repeatedly put pressure on Ram quarterback Steve Monaco, especially down the stretch, sacking him a season-high six times.

"Villanova's defense came up with the big play when they had to," Griffin said. "Their defense was the key factor in winning the ballgame."

V.U. used a hard-hitting, aggressive style of defense which senior linebacker Tom Reid believed was a key. "They were pretty strong up front, but basically we had a good scouting report and we played aggressive," Reid said. "When we play aggressive, with our talent, we're good."

Reid, who finished the day with a game-high 11 tackles and had three sacks, also feels that familiarity with each other has played a big part in the defense's development. "I think our defense is really starting to know each other, not just as teammates, but as people off the field. You get a really tight unit when you're helping each other, and that has been happening a lot this year."

Senior linebacker and co-captain John O'Brien thinks that the team's experience has much to do with its recent success. "We're more mature this year. We have a lot of older guys, finally," he said. "For the last couple of years we've been playing with freshmen and sophomores and a few juniors here and there. But now we have some seniors and some juniors that have played quite a bit."

O'Brien, who sat out the first half because of a neck and shoulder injury, came in and performed exceptionally, tallying nine tackles and three sacks in just three defensive series.

The 'Nova defense needed a solid effort because the offensive unit was never able to get on track. Quarterback Kirk Schulz had a rough outing and finished the day 12 of 22 for just 128 yards, and overall the offense's performance was disappointing.

"We were out of synch today, but you've got to credit Rhode Island," Talley said. "There weren't as many glaring holes in their defense as we thought they might have."

Though in general their performance was subpar, the Wildcat offense was very opportunistic, capitalizing on Rhode Island's mistakes for three of its four scores.

One series after sophomore kicker Tom Withka's 40-yard field goal had given the Cats a 3-0 lead, fullback Pete Lombardi rumbled eight yards for the first touchdown of the game.

Cassara, URI's punter, set up the score when his knee touched the ground while fielding a fourth-down snap. The result was a 15-yard loss and the ball was turned over to V.U. at the Ram 16-yard line.

The Rams cut the lead to 10-7 when wide receiver Kevin Smith scored on a 23-yard reverse with 2:21 left in the first half.

Cornerback Derek McEwen recovered the first of Rhode Island's two third-quarter fumbles midway through the period at the V.U. 48. Schulz then directed a seven-play, 52-yard 'Nova scoring drive, capped off by a four-yard TD pass to splitend Bobby Brady.

The Ram's second fumble came when Reid nailed Monaco, separating him from the ball. Junior linebacker Dan Falasca pounced on the loose ball at URI's 25.

Nine plays later, Withka booted a 25-yard field goal to give V.U. a 20-7 lead. Though the Rams scored once more on a 13-yard TD pass from Monaco to Steve Schwab, 'Nova was able to hold on for the victory.

Next up for the Cats is a tough University of Connecticut team. The game will be played tomorrow at 1 p.m. in Storrs, Ct.

The Huskies (3-1) are coming off a hard-fought 25-24 win over Northeastern last Saturday and have Talley's respect. "It's a big game for us if we are going to be a factor in the conference," Talley said. "We are playing what I consider one of the elite teams in the conference."

CATS NOTES:

—With the victory, the Wildcats are now 2-0 in the Yankee Conference and in sole possession of first place.

—The win over Rhode Island represented Talley's 50th career win. He now owns an impressive 50-24-1 record and is 22-6 while at V.U. Talley celebrated the milestone in "Massimino-like" fashion by enjoying a post-game cigar.

—With his 113 yards rushing on 21 carries, Lombardi has 330 total rushing yards this season, good for 5th place in the Yankee Conference. Teammate Jeff Dingle ranks 4th with 333.

Field Hockey hits Big Five teams

By AMY C. SPENCER
Assistant Sports Editor

Villanova Field Hockey took no prisoners as they annihilated Drexel, 7-1 and St. Joseph's, 6-0 this week. But the tables were turned when they faced Temple as the Owls clawed them, 4-2.

The Wildcats are getting the reputation as a second-half team. Of the 15 goals they netted this week, 11 were second-half scores. Overall this season, the Cats have scored eight goals in the first period of play and 27 in the second.

Head Coach Cheryl Massaro commented, "The problem I see with this team is their consistency. They play weak the first half and strong the second half. I want them to play strong 70 minutes, instead of 35 minutes. So that's what we're working to develop."

When the Cats faced St. Joe's on Oct. 3, they characteristically started slowly on offense, but quickly began to build up momentum.

The first goal was scored with 19:47 remaining in the first period by Sharon Seiz. Seiz powered a penalty shot past the Hawk goalkeeper and it slammed into the goal for a score. This performance was repeated eight minutes later when Seiz knocked in another penalty shot.

Villanova, comfortable with a 2-0 advantage at the start of the second period, improved their playing style and exhibited some superb stick handling in the second half. "It was a slow start and it wasn't until half-time, after we made some adjustments, that they finally settled down, realized what their job was, and put it together," observed Massaro. "The second half was the type of hockey that they should be playing all along."

Freshman forward, Missy Paolantonio, scored early in the second period and set the tone for the remaining time. The Cats handled the ball well against the

Soccer saves victory

Senior goalie Ron Klos recorded his 12th career shutout on Sept. 30 as the Wildcats defeated the Hawks of St. Joseph's University, 1-0. In doing so, Klos immortalized himself as the all-time shutout leader in Villanova Soccer history.

"He is just really good," commented Coach Chris Jones on his star goalie. Klos was forced to make 12 saves and survive two 10-minute overtime periods in pursuit of his record.

Senior Bill Gallagher tallied the Cat's only goal at 3:41 of the first overtime period. His indirect kick barely eluded the outstretched hands of the Hawk goalkeeper. This was the first goal of the season for the 5-foot-5, 140 pound forward from Sea Isle City, N.J.

Gallagher has perennially hurt the Hawks, scoring five of his six career points against them. He scored early in the Cat's 2-1 overtime victory over St. Joe's in the 1986 season.

In a 1987 shutout, Gallagher assisted on the only goal of the game. Thus, his game-winning goal this season must have come as no surprise to the Hawks.

The play in this 1-0 victory became rough at times, as two St. Joseph's players received yellow cards for knocking Villanova players to the turf. Throughout, the game was marred by many stoppages for indirect kicks.

The Cats did not fare so well earlier in the week, however. They were shutout by a strong Temple team on Sept. 28, 3-0.

The Owls dominated this game from the outset. They held an 18-3 advantage in shots on goal. The Cats had just come off a nine-day break and appeared sluggish.

This loss left them at 3-4-1 overall, 1-1 within Philadelphia's Soccer 7. The Cats face the University of Pennsylvania on Oct. 4, in their Soccer 7 matchup.

On Oct. 8, the Georgetown Hoyas will visit Villanova Stadium for an important Big East game.

With basketball season right around the corner, it is about time to start worrying about getting season tickets for our beloved Wildcats.

With the high prices of tickets, many students will have to make some sacrifices to be able to afford the luxury of purchasing tickets. Should buying tickets to see your school team play be a luxury? That is the question that must be addressed.

As many Villanovans did, I went to the Basketball Club meeting to find out about the tickets for the upcoming season. In order to purchase season tickets through the club, I found out it would cost me $100.

This includes all the games at the duPont Pavilion, two games at the Spectrum and two games at the Palestra. The grand total comes to 16 games.

This price includes a $10 charge to cover dues for the club, and also gives the person the right to sit in the two middle sections of the student section at the duPont Pavilion. Members are permitted to go on roadtrips sponsored by the club to away games, as well.

The other alternative for the Villanova student is to buy a package directly from the Villanova ticket office. This deal includes all the games offered by the club except the two games at the Palestra.

But the students who purchase these packages will not be allowed to sit in the two prime sections reserved by the Basketball Club in duPont, and they will not be allowed to go on roadtrips sponsored by the club. The cost of this is $78.

Are these prices too high and are students being taken advantage of? I decided to check the prices of the other

V.U. gives to Setzer Fund

Student Government presented a $6,870 donation to a trust fund for the family of slain Lower Merion police officer Edward M. Setzer on Oct. 25.

The donation, which was the largest single gift to the fund, was made on behalf of the University. Student Government President John Lewis presented it to police officer Jude Ryan and Ardmore First Trust Bank Manager Harold Hutt.

On Sept. 30, Setzer was killed in the line of duty. A suspect, Kendall Hatfield, has been brought into custody and is being charged with this and other crimes in the area surrounding the University.

In response to Setzer's death, the Lower Merion Fraternal Order of Police has organized a trust fund to provide for the future of his three children.

This trust fund has generated a wave of generosity throughout the Main Line area.

The money raised is mainly a result of the efforts of Student Government. During the weekend of Oct. 7 to Oct. 9 Student Government began to examine fund raising suggestions and decided to organize a raffle. University President the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., agreed for the University to match the money raised by the raffle tickets, thus doubling the donation.

The drive lasted from Oct. 12 to Oct. 15. Director of Alumni Robert J. Capone arranged for the raffle prize of four tickets to a Villanova basketball game. Other prizes donated were two tickets to a 76ers game, autographed Flyers memorabilia and a sweatsuit.

University evaluation begins

By MAUREEN STAPLETON
Staff Reporter

The University is beginning a self-study for accreditation from the Committee on Higher Education, Middle States Association of Colleges and Schools. The steering committee for the self-study is being chaired by Dr. Helen K. Lafferty, assistant dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences.

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, said, "I'm very happy with the timing of the self-study." He explained that the "tremendous response" from the Program Evaluation Committee (PEC) report had prompted the administration to establish several ad hoc committees to study different areas.

He said, "The self-study takes up where this evaluation process takes off."

Middle States evaluations occur every 10 years. Every university must be evaluated in order to be accredited by Middle States.

Lafferty said, "Middle States accreditation involves a continuing process designed to help an institution analyze its functions, appraise its performances, review its planning procedures and discover means by which its educational effectiveness can be strengthened.

"Accreditation is simply a judgment that an institution is providing the quality of educational services which society and an institution's peers have a right to expect," she said.

The Middle States evaluation committee will receive the self-study in the summer of 1990. A visiting team, appointed by the Middle States Association, will visit the campus for four days in October 1990, according to Lafferty.

UCO's methods discussed

Members defend practices and message

By JENNIFER REIDY
Assistant News Editor

"There are questions about the approach of the University Christian Outreach [UCO] to sexuality, authority and its methods of religious education," said the Rev. Shawn Tracy, O.S.A., director of Campus Ministry, recently.

"The UCO is a very closely knit group. It, like many other groups, can create an intense pressure on its members to follow basic ritual behaviors of thought as well as action. This is not necessarily negative, but in some situations, it certainly can be," Tracy said.

"This danger is intensified in religious organizations," he continued.

Tracy said that "I have never had cause to doubt their faith in God or their sincerity in wanting to spread His message," but the UCO makes "practical mistakes in recruiting and teaching."

"We are a group of people who love God and desire to serve God. Perhaps I'm naive but I presume that also describes every other Catholic and Christian on campus who takes seriously their religion. We don't want to be judged by impressions in the Villanovan that come from those that have heard things about us but do not know us," according to a letter written by Neal Lozano, regional director of UCO.

The UCO was first publicly criticized in an op-ed in the April 15 issue of the Villanovan by a Villanova student, Frank Pucci. Pucci wrote of his personal experience with the organization and described the UCO as "cult-like" and "a fanatical recruit group." He told of a friend involved in UCO who "had assumed a new

Playboy edition stirs controversy

Representatives from Playboy magazine will be interviewing in the Villanova area from Nov. 4-7 for its "Women of the Big East" pictorial, which will run in the April 1989 issue of the magazine.

The official response of University president the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., was, "Villanova considers Playboy's philosophy and practice as exploitative of women. The president of the University is confident that the women of Villanova will see this overture for what it is. Accepting the invitation to be photographed by Playboy would be demeaning to them personally, to women in general, and to the reputation of the University."

Dobbin said Oct. 26 that he hopes for a universal rejection of the Playboy campaign by University women. "We could make an important statement by doing it ... it is an effective statement when the people in the institution act accordingly."

The Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, said, "People are free to decide whatever they want to do. However, they should be aware of how a statement like that [posing in Playboy] ties into Villanova University and the possible ramifications of that statement."

Stack cited the Code of Student Conduct, which states, in cases involving student behavioral problems which occur off campus, "the University reserves the right to exercise its discretion taking disciplinary action following a proper and orderly hearing. The University will exercise its right to do so in cases where the University's reputation, or its orderly functioning as an academic community, are clearly involved and distinct."

He added, "Playboy is looking to exploit the Big East. If someone wants to be part of that that's their decision ... [however] this is conduct that clearly affects the good name of the University."

Wilke hearing begins today

By DANTE J. SCALA

Communication arts professor Raymond G. Wilke, threatened with dismissal because of alleged teaching deficiencies, will present his case before his peers in an open hearing today, said Dr. Edwin Goff, philosophy professor, Tuesday.

The hearing, which will begin at 9 a.m. in the North Lounge of Dougherty Hall, was requested by Wilke. He and a representative of the University president's office, philosophy professor Dr. Benedict A. Paparella, will present evidence to a committee of three professors, said Goff.

After hearing the evidence, the committee will eventually make a recommendation on the case to University President the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., said Goff. It could advise that Wilke be declared innocent, that the administration enter arbitration with him, or that he should be suspended or dismissed, said Goff.

Parts of the hearing resemble a court trial, Goff said, however, that the hearing was supposed to have a collegial atmosphere in which the facts would be sorted out, rather than a prosecutorial atmosphere.

The open hearing will be the first one held under procedures implemented by the University five years ago, said Goff.

Notified in June

Wilke was notified of the University's intention to dismiss him in June, said Goff, who will speak at the hearing as president of the American Association of Univer-

McGovern visits Villanova
'72 presidential candidate defends liberalism

By JENNIFER REIDY
Assistant News Editor

"I am very proud to be a liberal," proclaimed Sen. George McGovern to hundreds of students, faculty and visitors during his lecture titled, "The Making of the President," on Oct. 25 in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center.

"I think that all of you who have followed this 1988 presidential campaign have heard the term 'McGovern Democrat.' It's usually used as kind of a swear word," he noted, referring specifically to Republican nominee Vice President George Bush's use of the term.

"I think George Bush makes a mistake in ridiculing liberalism ... He uses the word 'liberal' as though it were synonymous with communism or leprosy," McGovern said, evoking laughter from the audience.

McGovern also criticized Democratic nominee Gov. Michael Dukakis as "too timid" in professing his liberal credentials. This statement provoked much applause from the crowd.

McGovern continued to defend the philosophy of liberalism throughout his lecture: "I can't think of any major program in the statute books of this country ... that did not begin as a liberal initiative," he said.

"President Reagan has said over the past years that he won't touch Social Security, and that's the view of most politicians — conservatives and Democrats. But how many people know that Social Security was a liberal initiative that was bitterly resisted by conservatives?" McGovern asked.

He also cited Medicare as a "liberal initiative," and questioned, "How many people know

Black Panther to speak

By DIANE A. CILIONE
Staff Reporter

Bobby Seale, who helped found the Black Panther Party in the 1960s, will speak at the University on Thursday at 7:30 p.m. in Room 215, Tolentine Hall.

His lecture is one in a series sponsored by the Honors program in conjunction with "The 1960s: Politics and Culture" course offered this semester, according to Bob Pigeon, history professor. The lecture is co-sponsored by the Black Cultural Society.

Seale will speak about the activism of the 1960s and will compare the "spontaneous, mass political activity of that time with the community-based organizing which needs to be done today," said Pigeon.

"The Black Panther Party, which Seale co-founded in 1966 in Oakland, Cal., was established to organize black revolutionary activity against the white power structure," said Pigeon. The group formed in response to police officers who had been roaming at night and beating black people, according to Pigeon.

At the 1968 Democratic Convention Seale gave a 20-minute speech to demonstrators, which resulted in an indictment for him and seven others for conspiracy to promote a riot. The eight defendants became famous during the 1969 trial, during which Seale was bound and gagged by the judge because of his interruptions, said Pigeon.

Seale was later acquitted of all charges in the case, Pigeon added.

Seale was tried in 1970 for conspiracy to commit murder and was later acquitted of those charges, but was jailed for two years while awaiting trial, explained Pigeon.

During his incarceration, Seale wrote a book, Seize the Time. In 1978, Seale wrote a book titled A Lonely Rage.

Presently, Seale is a special assistant to the dean at Temple University and is organizing student involvement in the community. He is also pursuing a doctorate degree in political science. In addition, last year he wrote a barbeque cookbook titled Barbeque'n With Bobby, said Pigeon.

The lecture series has also included journalist Milton Viorst, author of Fire in the Streets who spoke on Oct. 27. Kenneth Gallagher will also give a talk on the 1960s on Nov. 17 in Tolentine Hall, Room 215, said Pigeon.

Zahm new vice president

By KEVIN C. HEIL
Assistant News Editor

Student Government President John Lewis selected student senator Jonathan Zahm to be his vice president Oct. 5.

Zahm said he will serve as a liaison between the University Senate and Student Government: "We need the lines of communication to be open so that we are all working towards the same goals. I will have to get to know everyone really well, both on a working and a friendly basis," he said.

He added that he and Lewis hope to make changes in the Senate constitution to allow freshmen and sophomores to serve as student senators. They plan to present a proposal on this issue to the Senate at a future meeting.

Zahm said that he and Lewis would also like to open the Senate budgetary process to students to allow for more student access and input. "Then we will be able to see what the University considers to be the main priorities, and see if those priorities are favorable to students," Zahm explained.

"The vice president[ial position] in any situation is difficult to define. Most important is an ability to work closely with the president ..., to be an advisor. John and I have been friends since I came here as a transfer student, and we know each other really well. We've done things politically on a local and state level and we have an understanding of one another," Zahm explained.

He said he does not plan to be a figurehead, but someone who will work hard as a senator and Senate caucus leader. He said he hopes to be vocal and strongly committed to issues which he finds important.

He said it is an added responsibility to be a student senator as well as vice president. He plans to work even more closely with the Senate and attend many of its committees' meetings in order to gain a better understanding of their functions and responsibilities.

"I will be doing things as senator that are going to aid the Student Government as a whole and aid me in my performance as vice president," Zahm said.

Notice of Zahm's selection was not immediately released at the beginning of Lewis' term.

V.U. astronaut to lecture on NASA day

University Press Release

In recognition of the 30th anniversary of the founding of NASA, the University will launch NASA Day on Tuesday, featuring a talk by astronaut Andy Allen at 8 p.m. in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center.

The NASA Day presentation is free and open to the public.

Allen, a native of Richboro, Pa., and a Villanova alumnus, will discuss his 1987-88 astronaut training experience and will present a 20-minute film about the space shuttle.

With the space program in full throttle again since the Sept. 29 launch of the space shuttle Discovery, Allen is slated to fly in space on a future mission. He learned the complexities of piloting the space shuttle as an astronaut trainee.

Just 30 short years ago, Explorer I, a U.S. Earth satellite, was fired into orbit atop a Jupiter-C launch vehicle on Jan. 31, 1958, propelling America into the Space Age. As the 21st century approaches, the race is on for men and women to explore other planets, powered by man-made machines. Andy Allen has joined the ranks of this elite group of explorers.

During training at the Johnson Space Center in Houston, Texas, he underwent extensive physical and psychological tests. Unlike some of the seemingly barbaric tests performed on the first astronauts portrayed in "The Right Stuff," NASA now "tells you everything they are going to do to you. They don't let anything go untouched," Allen said in an article that appeared in the Autumn 1987 issue of Villanova Magazine.

At the space center, he has met some of those veteran first astronauts, such as Alan Shepard and John Glenn, as well as other boyhood heroes, including test pilot Chuck Yeager.

While at Villanova, Allen spent four years in the University's Navy ROTC program, receiving a bachelor's degree in mechanical engineering in 1977. After graduation, he was commissioned in the Marine Corps and attended flight school for two years in Pensacola, Fla.

In addition, he attended and graduated from the Marine Weapons and Tactical Instructor Course and Navy Fighter Weapons School, known as "Top Gun."

On June 5, 1987, while a test pilot under instruction at the U.S. Navy Test Pilot School in Patuxent River, Md., Allen learned that of 1,962 applicants, he was one of 15 chosen for the astronaut trainee program at the Johnson Space Center.

Co-sponsoring NASA Day events are the University's College of Engineering, Navy ROTC program, Common Heritage Institute and the Villanova/NASA Space Shuttle Experiment Program. The latter group, composed of 35 faculty, staff and students, is currently involved in designing two basic science experiments bound for space via the space shuttle.

One project, the vapor phase change experiment, will investigate the effects of zero-gravity on boiling liquids. The other, called the polymer fabrication experiment, will explore whether zero-gravity contributes to the manufacturing of super-long polymer chains. Experiments must be contained in "Get Away Special" canisters provided by NASA.

Initiated in 1984 by Karl J. Zimmer, mechanical engineering professor, the program allows students to gain hands-on design experience and requires them to confer with scientists and engineers in industry.

Allen will meet student and faculty members of the campus Space Shuttle Experiment Program, as well as take part in NROTC activities throughout the day prior to his 8 p.m. talk. For more information, call 645-4590.

Nursing starts new program

Villanova University's College of Nursing now offers a streamlined track for registered nurses seeking their bachelor of science in nursing degrees. The new program also provides an option for students to matriculate immediately into the master's degree program.

Of the 23 required credits in nursing that must be taken at Villanova, three credits are earned in a course specifically designed for the registered nurse population. The remaining 20 credits are earned in courses in nursing research, health promotion and community nursing and nursing leadership.

Students can register for graduate-level nursing courses as electives. They may choose to enroll in the graduate-level nursing research course if they have met prerequisites.

When students have completed all but 12 credits of the undergraduate program, they are eligible to apply to the master of science in nursing degree program. Credits saved by meeting undergraduate requirements with graduate courses can be applied to a concentration in an area of personal interest.

For further details, contact Dr. Carolyn Oiler in the College of Nursing at 645-4927.

Soviet professor to lecture

Professor Timor Timofeev of the University of Moscow will speak on "Perestroika and the World" at the University on Thursday.

The lecture, to which the public is invited, will be held at 4:30 p.m. in Room 110 in Bartley Hall.

Timofeev, a member of the Soviet Academy of Sciences, is director of his university's Institute for Comparative International Studies and is vice chairman of the Soviet Committee on Peace Research and Disarmament. His lecture will be sponsored by the Common Heritage Institute and co-sponsored by the history and political science departments, the Honors program and the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

Fraternity to hold food drive

Once again, the Sigma Nu fraternity will extend a helping hand to the homeless as it starts its second annual "Can Do."

Gary Bonas, assistant director of Student Activities, will serve as the honorary chairman for the event, which will be held before tomorrow's football game on the corner of Lancaster and Ithan avenues.

Last year's drive raised over $650 and 10,000 pounds of canned food, which were donated to and distributed by the Archdiocese of Philadelphia.

Sigma Nu's active and alumni brothers will collect donations.

Vice presidential candidates debate

Quayle assailed on competence

By HALLIE ZIMMERMAN
Staff Reporter

On Oct. 5, vice presidential candidates Sen. Dan Quayle and Sen. Lloyd Bentsen debated each other's qualifications and positions on issues.

The topics included "breakfast clubs," the economy, social security, environment, farmers, the deficit, contra aid and poverty.

In the 90-minute exchange held in the Omaha Civic Auditorium, both candidates often ducked specific questions in order to pursue their set strategy and recite their programmed answers. The debate was monitored by Judy Woodruff of PBS. Tom Brokow of NBC, Jon Margolis of the Chicago Tribune and Brit Hume of ABC questioned the candidates.

Despite the variety of issues, the key question for Quayle, 41, was whether he was qualified to be president in the event of George Bush's death. he claimed "Qualifications for the office of presidency or vice presidency are not age alone."

He cited his 12 years in the Congress and said he has "more experience than the governor of Massachusetts" in national security issues and economic matters.

The highlight of the evening came when Brokaw questioned Quayle about his preparedness for the presidency. Quayle said, "Three times I've had this question and I'll try to answer it again for you as clearly as I can ... I have far more experience than many others that have sought the office of vice presidency ... I have as much experience as Jack Kennedy did when he sought the presidency."

Bentsen evoked cheers and applause from the Democrats in

Candidates split on defense

Bush, Dukakis differ on nuclear reliance

By DANIEL MORIARTY
Staff Reporter

In less than two weeks, Americans will choose between candidates with basic differences on the complex issue of national defense.

The primary concern of every defense policy since 1950, according to Dr. Martin J. Manley, political science professor, has been to effectively contain and deter Communist expansion.

"If we're going to make our defense dollars count, we've got to stop pouring billions and billions into this [present] program and do some hard thinking about what we're trying to achieve," Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis said at a Georgetown speech reported by the New York Times in September.

"We have serious problems with our conventional forces right now. And those problems will get worse unless we have a president who is willing to make tough decisions," Dukakis said during the second presidential debate.

Vice President George Bush proposes that the United States continue to rely heavily on nuclear weapons for its defense, updating the technology in the land, sea and air triad.

"The Soviets are modernizing. They continue to modernize. And we can't simply say, 'We've got enough nuclear weapons — let's freeze,'" Bush said during the second debate.

Dukakis supports development of the Stealth bomber, which is designed to be undetectable by radar, the advanced cruise missile, which travels close to the ground to avoid anti-missile systems and radar, the D-5 submarine missile and the Trident II submarine missile, according to September reports in the U.S. News and World Report and The New York Times.

Dukakis does not support implementing the mobile, land-based MX missile.

Critics say rail-mobile MX missiles are necessary in U.S.-Soviet relations. Dukakis has not offered a specific alternative.

Bush does support development of the mobile MX missile and an alternate, the Midgetman missile, until a choice between the two is made.

In The New York Times, Dukakis replied, "The strategic concept of the Midgetman is sound, but I question the value of spending $40 billion to $50 billion for 500 additional land-based missile warheads — at three times the cost of the same number of new submarine-based warheads."

In response to how he would save money on defense spending, Bush said in the second debate, "If I knew of ... weapons systems that were purely waste and weren't protected by Congress, they wouldn't be in the budget." However, he said, "I think we can save through the Packard Commission report."

The Packard Commission report addresses the problem of graft in Pentagon defense contracts. It suggests that bidding for defense contracts be open and that the Pentagon use consultants in choosing weaponry.

However, "critics of the report point out that these consultants would be able to sell strategy, then weaponry, instead of selling weaponry to fit the strategy," Manley said.

The candidates also disgree on how to fund the "Star Wars" defense system.

Current federal funding for the space-based, anti-missile system known as "Star Wars," or SDI (Strategic Defense Initiative) is at $4 billion annually.

Bush pledges continued major funding of SDI while Dukakis favors cutting funding to about $1 billion annually.

"To Dukakis, the leakproof umbrella envisioned by Reagan has been a wasteful dream — and a great many physicists agree," the U.S. News and World Report said in September.

In an interview with the Villanovan last April, renowned physicist Dr. Edward Teller disagreed.

"Opponents have said that it [SDI] should claim 100 percent effectiveness. It, of course, can't claim 100 percent effectiveness ... It is aimed at creating more trouble for the attacker than for the defender ... at deterring an attack by making it, in the end, ineffective," Teller said.

The question of nuclear testing highlights another difference between the candidates.

Bush opposes an absolute test ban, "citing the need to ensure safety and effectiveness," according to the U.S. News and World Report.

Dukakis is in favor of a total ban on nuclear testing, independent of any other strategic weapons limitations.

"Star Wars" debate rages

By G.J. DONNELLY
Staff Reporter

Both Republican nominee Vice President George Bush and Democratic rival Gov. Michael Dukakis have stressed the need for a strong defense.

Much of the defense debate has centered around the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), popularly known as "Star Wars." Bush supports testing and deployment while Dukakis wishes to cut its funding and continue research on a more modest level in order to save money.

The Strategic Defense Initiative is a space-based missile defense technology that allows U.S. forces to intercept and destroy Soviet missiles in the Earth's upper atmosphere.

According to an article in the March 21 issue of Aviation Week and Space Technology magazine, SDI is made up of the following parts:

— An unarmed kinetic kill vehicle designed to intercept and collide with an enemy missile before its warheads can be jettisoned.

— ERIS (Exoatmospheric Reentry Vehicle Interceptor System), a ground-based missile used as a secondary defense which theoretically will destroy enemy warheads after separation from their missiles.

— Space and ground-based satellites used for tracking enemy warheads and guiding anti-missile weapons to their targets.

— National Test Bed, a sophisticated computer network used for ground surveillance of SDI.

These four components, plus other long-term programs such as the $155.5 million free electron laser, will cost the U.S. government over $1.1 billion.

The heavy cost for this untested program concerns the candidates of both parties. Even Bush, a supporter of SDI, has shown restraint.

"He doesn't believe there's anything to deploy," explained Albert Carnesdale, a strategic analyst from Harvard University, to Aviation Week. "He says all the standard things — a little bit like the Democrats who say, 'Well, it's important to do research and development but that's all, and for less money than we spend now.'"

Dukakis has said cuts should be made in the nuclear force, citing the INF (Intermediate range Nuclear Forces) treaty and placing Sullivan is the Democratic candidate for a seat in the Pennsylvania State Senate, and Gore's apperance here at Villanova is expected to provide a boost to Sullivan's candidacy, said Mary Pat Bonner, a representative of the Sullivan campaign.

The rally will take place in the East Lounge of Dougherty Hall for approximately half an hour, said Bonner. Flyers will be posted around campus to remind students and faculty of the event. All are invited to attend.

Budget deficit discussed

By MICHAEL BELLOPEDE
Staff Reporter

Two University economics professors recently discussed the presidential candidates and the issue of the budget deficit.

Dr. James J. Clarke first shares his views and comments and is then followed by the opinions of Dr. Martin Asher.

Dr. James J. Clarke

Why is the budget deficit important? And how does it affect the economy? The nation?

If you need to finance the budget in the capital markets, you most likely are going to drive interest rates up, which then encourages the expansion of money, which in turn encourages inflation. In the last few years the United States has not financed its own debt, it has been [financed by] the Japanese and other foreigners, subsequently the debt has not had an impact on our economy.

How do you think Dukakis or Bush will resolve the deficit problem when elected to office?

The deficit is a congressional issue, it is not the president who is responsible for the debt. The reason the deficit has not been a problem thus far is because foreigners have been financing it for us.

The way to address the deficit is not by trying to raise taxes. The deficit is a congressional issue, it is the congressional mental attitude. Since 1960, we have had 29 deficits out of 30 budget years.

Dukakis, in all probability, will move to raise taxes. Bush will try to grow out of it by [an] across-the-board freeze of spending increases, which I believe is a good plan. He will then attempt to ride out the deficit.

Dr. Martin Asher

Why is the budget deficit important? And how does it affect the economy? the nation?

If the budget is very large it means that government may be borrowing lots of funds, the government is spending beyond its means. If it continues the way it has, it then can affect interest rates, which could have an effect upon all investments and the way we spend. This includes consumer spending, which is interest-sensitive.

We haven't seen a big jump in interest rates in relationship to the debt because of the international assistance we have received in financing our debt. However, if that assistance dries up we may see a substantial jump in interest rates.

The budget deficit affects the Chapel changes to cost $2 million

By PATRICK MOUSSEAU
Staff Reporter

The Main Chapel will undergo major renovations within the next two years at a cost of approximately $2 million, said the Rev. Shawn Tracy, O.S.A., director of Campus Ministry, recently.

When the major work begins, the church will be shut down for six months to a year, said Tracy.

Tracy is overseeing the liturgical changes that will occur in accordance with changes within the University community and the parish of St. Thomas of Villanova.

Tracy said that changes in the church began 25 years ago with the second Vatican Council's steps to revolutionize the liturgy. "The time has come to blend the structure of the building to contemporary liturgical design," he said.

"As a body of people change and grow in faith, their building takes on similiar characteristics," he noted. The renovations will achieve this while respecting the traditional architecture of the church, Tracy added.

The previous altar was covered and surrounded by wood and marble. After Vatican II, the altar was remade to its present condition, said Tracy.

Other proposed changes include replacement of the electrical system, the addition of a better lighting system and installation of air-conditioning and heating systems.

The Reverend Allan Fitzgerald, O.S.A., religious studies professor, is working with Tracy and the committee as the liturgical designer. Fitzgerald said that it is too early to tell what the church will look like when completed. The goal will be to bring congregation into fuller participation with the ceremony, he explained.

Renovations on the main chapel will cost approximately $2 million and will take place over the next three years.

This will be accomplished by "relieving some of the clutter," he said. The altar in the back is unused and the side aisles will be widened.

Fitzgerald said that "sometimes a person's faith becomes identified with the place of worship." To change the space challenges the way faith is expressed, and this change is not always easy, he said.

Fund raising drive planned

By BARBARA KRESCH
Staff Reporter

The largest fundraising campaign in the University's history is being planned, Edward A. Morosky, associate vice president of University Relations, said recently.

The capital campaigns are run in addition to the nine annual fund raising programs and serve the purpose of raising money for "specific University needs that arise above and beyond what is in the budget," said Morosky.

A market study is being done by an outside fund raising firm to find out the interests of 100 of the major donors to the University, said Moroski. The market study will essentially decide on the needs of the University that will be met by the campaign.

Morosky said that the importance of the market study is that more than half of the money that is raised in these campaigns is contributed by less than 1 percent of the donors and one-tenth of the donors contribute 90 percent of the funds.

He said the study is planned to be ready in January and the proposal should be presented to the Board of Trustees in April, which will make the final decisions on the type, length and monetary expectations of the campaign.

He said that two principal needs that are being discussed are the development of west campus and the increase of endowment which is "meager for a school this size," as well as a number of other needs.

Moroski predicted that if the monetary expectations are large enough, the campaign may be run in three waves, each lasting about four or five years. From this campaign, a larger number of University needs will be met, he added.

The first fund raising campaign lasted from 1975-81 and raised $9 million to build the Connelly Center, according to information provided by the Rev. George F. Riley, O.S.A., vice president for University Relations.

Covenant II, the second campaign, which lasted from 1983-1987, raised a total of $25 million for the building of the duPont Pavilion and other University needs, according to the information provided by Riley.

The donors include trustees, alumni, foundations, corporations, friends, the Augustinian order, faculty, staff and parents from all over the country.

The University needs approximately $300 million in order to complete its master plan of development and expansion, said the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., former University president, in February.

University water free of radon

By LYNNAE BOROWSKI
Staff Reporter

Although Pennsylvania has a serious radon problem, there are no dangerous levels of radon detectable in the water at Villanova, said Dr. Rodney Donlan, supervisor of laboratories and technical services at the Philadelphia Suburban Water Company.

Currently, Pennsylvania is among the 10 worst states with a radon problem. Pennsylvania is ranked fourth after North Dakota, Minnesota and Colorado, according to a recent survey by Time.

Radon is found in one out of three homes and is responsible for 30,000 deaths a year, according to the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA).

The EPA also said that over 50 percent of the homes in Pennsylvania have a significant radon problem.

In addition, the National Cancer Institute ranks radon ash the #1 reason for lung cancer deaths in non-smokers.

Radon gas is generated when uranium decays in the soil. The gas is odorless and colorless, which makes it difficult to detect in homes, according to the Sept. 20 issue of the Mainliner.

Besides the concern that radon is entering homes through cracks in foundations and basement exposures, there is also a concern that radon is entering the water supply, the Mainliner said.

There are two types of water supplies that furnish the suburban area: ground water and surface water. Radon cannot be seen in surface water, but is seen in some ground water, explained Donlan.

The University supply is surface water, which is not being monitored, because "the radon level in Villanova's supply is virtually nothing," commented Donlan.

However, the water company is monitoring radon from ground water, because ground water is at a higher level than surface water, said Donlan.

In the future, the company will have to monitor radon levels in all drinking water, but there are "no federal or state regulations saying that we must monitor radon at this time," said Donlan.

The surface water supply comes from Pickering Creek Treatment Plant and the Schuylkill River. This supply serves all of the Main Line, said Donlan.

Board game source of controversy

Parker Brothers, Inc., wants the College Republicans to stop using Monopoly-like "Get Out of Jail Free" cards to take jabs at Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis.

Parker Brothers, which manufactures and markets Monopoly, sent a "cease and desist" letter to the College Republican National Committee (CRNC) last month, but at least one campus chapter, at the University of Arizona, has kept using the cards as a way to satirize a Massachusetts jail furlough program.

"As far as we're concerned," said Parker Brothers spokeswoman Patricia McGovern, "they're infringing upon our copyright. We do not want them using the logo."

"I do understand that Parker Brothers' chairman is a Republican, so I think that's why we're allowed to use them," Rossi told the Arizona Daily Wildcat, the campus paper.

Parker Brothers says that's untrue. "I don't know the political affiliation of anybody at Parker Brothers," countered McGovern.

Baylor University foils pie plot

Baylor University police have gotten their revenge on a man who made extra money helping students "cream" professors.

In a "sting" operation, two undercover Baylor officers arrested "The Pie Man," who, through advertisements chalked on campus sidewalks, charged his customers $50 to hit professors in the face with cream pies.

He charged $30 to pie students.

Without identifying themselves, Baylor police hired The Pie Man to "hit" marketing professor Dr. James Hunt, and then arrested tthe man, whose name has not been released, as he barged into Hunt's classroom Sept. 30 wearing "a nylon pantyhose over his head with the legs hanging down" and firing a cream pie, officer M.E. Stewart reported.

Stewart said "The Pie Man" was "very quick. I think it even surprised the professor, who was expecting it."

"I was able to dodge most of the pie," Hunt told the Baylor Lariat, the student paper. "Most of the pie hit the blackboard."

"Credit goes to the Baylor [police] for making a very good sting operation," added Charles Capone, an economics professor pied by the masked entrepreneur during a Sept. 12 class in microeconomic theory.

The Capone incident convinced Carl Bradley, Baylor's dean of Student Disciplinary Affairs, to call in the police. "People," he explained, "cannot burst into a classroom and totally disrupt an organized class."

Library security changed

By ELLIOT A. FUS
Staff Reporter

A book security system was installed at the exit area of Falvey Memorial Library during fall break, said Dr. Mary Ann Griffin, the library's director.

The collection has been treated so that items not checked out at the circulation desk or the reserve room will trigger an alarm. The treatment process started last spring, she said.

Inventory inspections have revealed 10 to 12 percent of the colection unaccountable, she said. She expects the new system to reduce the loss rate by up to 80 percent. This would recoup the system's cost in approximately three years.

A book security system had been requested by faculty members for several years, said Griffin. These systems are commonly found in libraries the size of Falvey Memorial Library in order to insure that items in the collection are more readily available to users.

Falvey Memorial Library installed a new security system over the fall break.

The installation of the system eliminates the necessity for individual item checks upon exiting. If the alarm sounds, however, bookbags and other items will be subject to inspection.

Griffin reported that the library has encountered no major problems with its recent security effort so far.

Nursing day to be held

By SINEAD QUINN
Staff Reporter

The College of Nursing and the Undergraduate Nursing Senate will hold their annual Career Day for health care agencies seeking to hire College of Nursing graduates in the duPont Pavilion on Thursday from 10:15 a.m. to 3 p.m.

The program for Career Day includes a panel discussion with two College of Nursing graduates from 10:15 a.m. to 11:15 a.m. Mamie Guidera and Anne Smith will discuss their post-graduation experiences as well as their current roles as nurses in two very different environments: a birthing center and a shelter for homeless men.

This year's Nursing Career Day was organized chiefly by David Leibig of the Career Development Center, Rose M. O'Driscoll, assistant to the dean of the College of Nursing, and Undergraduate Nursing Senators Patricia Ryan and Elizabeth Marks.

The Nursing Career Day is the longest running career day on campus. This year, the location was changed from the Connelly Center to the duPont Pavilion in order to accommodate the more than 150 agencies that are scheduled to come to the program.

O'Driscoll attributes the marked increase in the number of recruiting agencies to the national nursing shortage.

"Health care agencies come from all over the country not only because of the large number of nurses that graduate from such a reputable school as Villanova, but because it has become necessary to recruit nurses because of the shortage," O'Driscoll noted.

Not only has recruitment become necessary, but in order to attract well-qualified nurses, health care agencies must offer incentives such as health benefits and a variety of monetary benefits. In addition they offer such benefits as tuition reimbursement in order to encourage the nurses they employ to continue their education to the graduate level, she said.

Bush, Dukakis define "Star Wars" postures

more emphasis on conventional weaponry. His budget calls for cuts in the MX (Missile experimental) missiles, small intercontinental ballistic Midgetman missiles and SDI, while increasing the conventional arsenal with weapons like the Stealth bomber.

"We could deposit the remaining $50 billion in the treasury," he told Aviation Week.

Dukakis and Bush are not the only public officials thinking about reduction of SDI. In the Oct. 9 issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer, the Pentagon publicly called for a reduction in cost.

Air Force Lt. Gen. James Abrahamson told a joint hearing of the House and Senate Armed Services Committees that the first phase of the "Star Wars" system could be deployed for $69 billion. The cost was originally estimated at $150 billion and was re-estimated at $115 billion last year.

Abrahamson insisted that the program itself was not changed. He explained that project scientists have devised a cheaper way to design the space-based sensors so that fewer of them would be needed.

The results of the budget cut would be as follows:

— The schedule for each phase of the SDI program is being delayed to the extent where even the next president would be hard-pressed to make any major decisions.

— The first phase of an SDI system — to defend missile sites, bomber bases and communications networks — is being conceived less as a space-based weapons system and more as a land-based anti-ballistic missile system.

— The more exotic aspects of the second and third phases-laser, charged particle beams and other futuristic weapons to protect cities as well as military installations — are being put on back burners.

Problems with bomber

The experimental Northrup B-2 Stealth bomber has been under heavy criticism for production delays.

Gen. John T. Chain Jr., commander of the Strategic Air Command, admitted, "We might not get the B-2 on line as quickly as we'd like." The first flight of the B-2 is scheduled for later this fall.

Development of the B-2, which resembles a large wing, faces additional obstacles. Rising costs and cuts in defense may force further delay in bringing it on line.

The Air Force has hoped for a B-2 to be operational by the early 1990s. Les Aspin (D-Wis), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, indicated last April that those projections were unrealistic.

Deficit issue discussed

economy two-fold. If you are spending beyond your means, it says that you are taking more money out than you are bringing in. Therefore, economic activity will increase. This is the illusion of growth vice presidential candidate [Sen. Lloyd] Bentsen meant during his debate when he referenced the writing of "hot checks" of $2 billion a year.

The economy is stimulative and stronger, but it may be negative to an investor if and when interest rates begin to rise. We have been able to have mild interest rates relative to our deficit because its financing has been by foreigners. In the past, when deficits were owed to ourselves it was an internal concern, but now it is owed to others, primarily foreign investors. If this source dries up all of a sudden, then we are going to see an increase in interest rates.

How do you think the candidates will resolve the issue of the deficit?

I think both will need to address spending cuts, and then the issue is where will they cut, defense or domestic budgets, and whether it [the cut] is sufficient to address a $100 to $150 billion deficit.

If these cuts are not sufficient, then someone is going to need to raise taxes. Neither candidate wants to address the issue of raising taxes. Mondale lost the previous election and pollsters predict that in all probability Dukakis will also.

President Reagan would not raise taxes, his objective was to grow out of the deficit. However, the president's [former] economic advisor, [Martin] Feldstein, said it cannot happen. Currently, we are almost at full employment, less than 6 percent, and we are still incurring debt. Therefore, it appears that Reagan was wrong and Feldstein was right.

Growth alone doesn't appear to be the only resolution. We are going to need to make some hard decision of either tax increases or spending cuts.

Bush will not increase taxes, which means the alternative is cutting back on defense or domestic expenses, and which one specifically. On the other hand, Dukakis in all probability will protect the domestic programs and cut defense, as well as increase taxes.

What do you think will happen to interest rates?

I sense interest rates will increase and we need to recognize that there is a third player. This third player is the Federal Reserve Board and its influence on interest rates. Loose monetary policy will curb interest rates. Recently, we did see the increase in the Federal Discount Rate, hence firmer interest rates.

McGovern speaks

that George Bush scoffed at it as socialized medicine? ... He would be horrified if anyone accused himself of that now."

McGovern talked at length about his own campaign for the presidency in 1972 as well as his thoughts on the 1988 election. McGovern lost the 1972 election in a landslide to Richard W. Nixon, winning only one state out of 50.

"Why was I asked to talk about running for president? There might be people better qualified to speak on this topic, but I have learned that sometimes you learn more from your defeats than from your victories," he explained.

He said that he was often portrayed as "vacillating and fuzzy-headed" during the campaign, and he commented that "Abraham Lincoln never had to undergo a $65 million [Nixon's campaign fund] scrutiny.

He attributed his defeat to his outspokenness on issues of the day, especially the Vietnam War, to which he was adamantly opposed, and Watergate. "I had made it a practice to conclude my speeches that the Nixon administration was the most corrupt administration in the 200-year history of our country. Every time I said that, I lost another half a million votes," McGovern said.

McGovern said that "the most urgent single need" of modern politics is to return to "Constitutional principles, moral law and the truth and insight of the founding documents.

"If I were to give advice to the next president of the United States, I would say: heed the Constitution. Don't sell arms to Iran, don't divert money to the contras, don't use government agencies to 'get' people and don't involve the country in undeclared-covert wars," he said.

McGovern spoke about what he sees as "trivial issues that pervade the 1988 campaign." He referred specifically to the debate surrounding the Pledge of Allegiance, which he called "a little ditty cooked up by a small newspaper in Boston on a slow day." He remarked that "it is pathetic for the vice president to imply that Dukakis is a threat to the United States because he vetoed the bill [which required teachers to lead the pledge before a class]."

McGovern addressed the "packaging and marketing" of candidates in modern politics. "Either Bush or Dukakis would make a better president than a candidate. It is hard to look good under the pressures of a presidential campaign," he concluded.

the audience when he replied sharply, "Senator, you're no Jack Kennedy." Quayle glared at Bentsen and said, "That was really uncalled for, Senator."

Although Bentsen managed successfully to evade the question of his differences with his running mate by discussing their unanimity on the deficit issue, he did answer Hume's question on his $10,000-a-plate breakfasts with lobbyists known as Bentsen's "breakfast club." Bentsen admitted the breakfasts, which he eventually stopped having, were "a real doozy."

Quayle took advantage of the situation to note that Bentsen was the "number one PAC [Political Action Committee] raiser" and added, "I'm sure they weren't paying to have cornflakes."

On the economy, Bentsen drew some laughter from the audience when he responded to an inquiry about the present prosperity in America. He said, "If you let me write $200 million in hot checks every year, I could give you the illusion of prosperity, too."

On environment, Quayle claimed his voting record is strong, citing his support of Superfund environmental legislation and the Clean Water Act. He also berated Gov. Michael Dukakis for doing "virtually nothing" to clean up the polluted Boston Harbor.

Bentsen assailed the Reagan administration for neglecting family farmers. Quayle responded that the American farmer "did not need another Jimmy Carter grain embargo" and that Dukakis' best advice to the American farmer was to "grow Belgium endive."

Bush said Quayle hit a "home run" and he called him "the Canseco of American politics," referring to the Oakland A's slugger.

At a Boston rally, Dukakis said Bentsen "demonstrated that he was the only one on that stage who's ready [to assume the rule of the vice presidency]."

However, most political analysts agreed that the outcome of the debate was not enough to turn it around for Dukakis, who is trailing in the polls. According to the analysts, no crushing blows were made and neither Bentsen nor Quayle made any crucial mistakes.

Wilke hearing

sity Professors (AAUP).

"The formal charges are three. The most serious appears to be the allegation of teaching deficiencies ... simply, the failure to conduct classes in an effective, professional manner," said Goff. He said he preferred not to indicate the other charges because the first seems to be the most substantive.

Wilke was scheduled to be on sabbatical this semester, said Goff. The University revoked that sabbatical. Currently, Wilke is on leave with pay. He is still under contract with the University, said Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice president for academic affairs, Oct. 25.

Hearing procedure

The hearing will be convened by committee members Dr. G. Lee Christensen, civil engineering professor; Dr. Mary E. Desmond, biology professor; and Dr. Edward J. Mathis, economics professor. The committee was chosen by the executive committee of the faculty affairs committee, said Goff.

The parties involved will decide at the beginning of the hearing how best to proceed, said Goff.

Goff said that Wilke has a preliminary list of 40 to 45 witnesses. He added that the hearing would probably extend beyond today's session, which is supposed to last until 2:30 p.m.

Witnesses will be allowed to speak. Both parties will be able to question and cross-examine the witnesses, said Goff.

If necessary, the hearing will continue tomorrow in the Wayne-St. David's Room of Connelly Center, from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Goff said he will be called upon as a witness, in his role as AAUP president. He will state what the chairperson and the administration are responsible to do if there is a violation by a faculty member.

He said he will do this to reinforce the importance of following established procedures "so that all persons can receive procedural justice."

A final decision on Wilke's case may not be made for some time. After the hearing closes, parties can present additional evidence in written briefs within 20 days, said Goff. The committee will have to make a recommendation and a finding to support it no later than 30 days after the deadline for filing briefs.

Dobbin will have to make a final decision 30 days after the committee submits its recommendation and finding.

ACLU chapters prosper

By College Press Service

George Bush may be the best recruiter the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) ever had for campus chapters.

ACLU campus coordinators say the Republican presidential candidate's attacks on their group have increased their visibility, and that has resulted in increased membership in recent weeks.

Harvard Law School students "have shown an awful lot of interest in becoming card-carrying members of the ACLU," said Warren Asher of the Harvard Law School Civil Liberties Union. "People who always intended to join now do."

About 100 students, for example, attended an ACLU speaking event at the University of Maryland last week, a 100 percent increase over previous events.

"If anything, his attacks helped," added Mindy Kaiden of American University's ACLU chapter.

"We've had a substantial increase in requests for information about memberships," Lisa Beattie of the ACLU's New York office reports.

Bush persistently has attacked Democratic opponent Michael Dukakis for being a "card-carrying member of the ACLU," a group Bush characterizes as too left-wing for most Americans.

Dukakis joined the ACLU as a student at Swarthmore College, in part because he was angered by Sen. Joseph McCarthy's mid-1950s hunt for "card-carrying communists." McCarthy, whose red-baiting galvanized civil libertarians, was "our greatest membership recruiter," Dukakis told an interviewer last May.

Thirty years later, ironically enough, Bush's cries against Dukakis as a "card-carrying member of the ACLU" have done the same thing on campuses.

"There's a smell of McCarthyism about those kind of attacks," ACLU Executive Director Ira Glasser said. The ACLU, which says it's a nonpartisan, nonideological organization devoted to defending the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, is fighting back.

An advertising campaign, featuring actors Michael Tucker and Jill Eikenberry of "L.A. Law" and Burt Lancaster, will soon be waged to battle what the ACLU calls misrepresentations by the Bush campaign.

But on many campuses, such a campaign would be a waste of time.

"We have about 40 or 50 new members this year," said Chris Langone of the Cornell ACLU. "I don't know how many of them joined because of Bush, but that's our largest group in years. Usually we have about 20 or 30."

"We just got through our activities fair, and we had the highest number of people expressing interest ever sign up. About 125 signed up. Usually it's half that," Harvard's Asher said.

At Harvard, some students feared their assoication with the ACLU would later hurt their chances for government careers, especially if Bush wins. "All I can tell them is to do what their conscience tells them to do," Asher said.

The ACLU, which has defended radicals from the Communist Party to the Nazi Party and the Black Panthers to the Ku Klux Klan, aims to ensure constitutional rights are maintained, Langone said. At the national level, the ACLU has aided conservatives, including Lt. Col. Oliver North, he added.

Cornell's ACLU, in fact, is defending its loudest critics, the College Republicans, whose members were denied entrance to a Kitty Dukakis speech in September. "We're investigating this as political discrimination against Republicans," Langone explained.

"Even though Bush attacks us, we're defending him," Langone said.

Students attend conventions

By SHEILA A. COURTER
Staff Reporter

Seven Villanova students attended the Democratic and Republican national convention in Atlanta and New Orleans, respectively, through the Washington Center's Campaign '88 seminars, according to a news release from the Washington Center for Internships and Academic Seminars.

Students who attended the Republican convention were Scott Cassidy, Robert Law, Christopher Pepe, Beth Westerman, Arline Kerrigan, Philip Cassidy and Melissa Kessler. William Ferdinandsen attended the Democratic convention.

The seminars lasted two weeks and students were given hands-on work experience. According to the release, guest speakers who addressed the students at the Democratic convention included Bob Schieffer, Washington correspondent for CBS news, Robert Farmer, Dukakis' chief fundraiser, and Bob Beckel, Walter Mondale's 1984 campaign manager.

Speakers who addressed the Republican convention included Jerry Falwell, founder of the Moral Majority, Ron Walker, 1984 Republican National Convention manager and Lester Korn, United Nations ambassador.

"The most exciting part of the convention was having the opportunity to meet many key people in the party and to be right in the middle of the action," Law said.

The Washington Center will be holding another seminar, titled "Inauguration: The Transfer of Presidential Power," in Washington, D.C., from Jan. 15-21.

The Center will also offer two programs, "Leaders on Leadership" and "Law and Society" from Jan. 2-14. "Leaders on Leadership" will deal with the areas of business, politics and communication in government. "Law and Society" will center on the American judicial system.

The application deadline for all three programs is Nov. 15. Further information is available through Dr. Albert J. Dorley, history professor, or by contacting the center at 514 10th St., N.W., Washington, D.C., 20004, (202) 624-8000.

Student leaders gather to register voters

By College Press Service

Five hundred and fifty student leaders gathered in Washington, D.C., during the Sept. 30 weekend to try to figure out how to do something no one's ever done before:

Get college students to vote.

They are not alone. The chancellor of the City University of New York (CUNY), the student president at the University of Idaho, Public Interest Research Groups, the National Student Education Fund, the U.S. Student Association (USSA), the Grassroots Organizing Weekends Project, both major political parties and scores of campus groups nationwide are trying.

On Oct. 3, moreover, the student leaders were scheduled to start a month-long bus tour of eastern and midwestern campuses to try to register students to vote.

"We need to get students excited to vote," said University of Arizona student President John Fees.

"This is a watershed year," argued Catherine Crane of the National Student Campaign for Voter Registration, which held the weekend conference of student leaders. "This election will define the direction our country is going in."

CUNY Chancellor Joseph S. Murphy appealed to students' wallets: "There is a direct relationship between the amount of student-aid dollars available and the number of votes in the ballot box. You can be sure that elected officials understand both the cause and the effect."

However, since 1972, when 18-year-olds first got the right to vote and observers predicted a huge monolithic liberal student vote that would transform American politics, collegians generally have failed to cast ballots at all.

In 1984, less than half of the country's 26 million 18-to-24-year-olds even registered to vote. Fewer than 41 percent bothered to vote.

"[Students] tend to participate less than people in their middle years," reports Dr. Matthew R. Kerbel, a political scientist at Villanova University. "Students are less settled and their minds are on other things."

"And they feel their votes don't make a critical difference," Kerbel said.

"Students are busy with other things," concurred John Carmichael, a University of Alabama-Birmingham associate professor of political science and public affairs.

"If they are away from home, the logistics of registering may create difficulty. If they are not married, not homeowners, they don't feel a vested interest [in voting]," Carmichael added.

Kerbel figures there is not much chance of getting students interested in registering at least until "the World Series is over and the election is the only major sporting event in the country."

"It's more of a challenge [to try to lure students to voting booths] because the elections aren't exciting," conceded University of Oregon activist Karen Gaffney.

Students do, in fact, turn out in greater numbers than non-students of the same age, noted Kevin Harris of USSA.

Harris added they do so in spite of often not knowing how to register or where, of registrars who tell them, "you can't register unless you pay taxes in New York," or county clerks who will not deputize a registrar to serve the students.

So far, at least some students have responded to efforts to register them.

"Education issues, the disadvantages of being a student, the need for higher education funding" persuaded Gina Olson, an Illinois State University sophomore from Palos Heights, Ill. to register.

A registration drive at the University of Illinois' main Champaign-Urbana campus netted 1,250 new student voters in one day in September.

Methods and practices of UCO discussed unusually religious and narrow-minded view of life," and compared the group to cults of the Rev. Jim Jones and the Rev. Sun Myung Moon.

Pucci also recounted an event at which he viewed a film called "Rock 'n' Roll: A Search for God." He wrote, "What I thought would be a look from a Christian perspective at how some rock stars express their spirituality through their music was actually nothing more than an inflammatory fundamentalist propaganda film" about the role of satanism in rock and roll music.

Lozano responded in an interview that, "the movie was not a UCO-sponsored event, nor was it planned by the staff. It was a video passed among the UCO members.

"The movie explored the role of sexual immorality and drugs and the spiritual dynamic of the devil that some music blatantly sings about," he explained.

"[I was] asked ... why someone would think we were a cult. I don't know. Perhaps they don't know much about cults, about Christianity, or about UCO. Perhaps their experience of life is very narrow or perhaps they have not developed a sense of their own identity. I don't know, but there is often a temptation to give a group a label, to make it a black and white issue, so we don't have to deal with the complexities of real life," Lozano wrote in his letter.

He continued, "Cults want to isolate people from relationships, especially family relationships. We have always been very open, and yes, we are closely knit but we are not a 'closed' group. We encourage personal and family relationships, and for example, our Parents' Dinner has always been a very successful event."

"The movie did sensationalize satanism in rock and roll. But Frank [Pucci] has to realize that his friend made a personal decision not to listen to that kind of music anymore, not because of the UCO," responded Jacqueline Pitkin, a Villanova graduate and staff member of the UCO.

When asked why he thought Pucci wrote the op-ed, Lozano said, "Frank was questioning Christianity, not the UCO."

"Someone who doesn't believe in the basic doctrines of Christianity would not feel comfortable at our meetings," he said. "We don't intend to defend ourselves."

Lisa LeCause, a senior and a member of UCO since her freshman year, commented that "The word 'cult' is confusing to people. I think it may be scary whenever you get close to God. In today's society, spirituality is really not practiced. People complain about how boring Mass is, but what's missing is the Holy Spirit. I found this and fellowship, people living their faith, in the UCO.

"People may be afraid that it is a cult because it is different from our society. The usual American kid doesn't go to prayer meetings every week," LeCause added.

Connie Becker, a junior and member of UCO, commented, "The UCO is not a cult. We are not doing anything abnormal. We are a close-knit group, but if someone wants to leave, they can.

"A lot of people may be shocked by our charismatic worship [the presence of the Holy Spirit, as in the Pentecost, which may include speaking in tongues and faith healing]. This is obviously different than the majority of Christian worship today. And I can see if someone had never been exposed to it, they would be blown away by it," Becker explained.

"I had to adjust to it myself. When I realized the truth, however, I felt it was right. I understand that it is not meant for every Christian — it's a form of faith some people are called to," Becker concluded.

Due to "ideological differences," the UCO and Campus Ministry are no longer affiliated, according to Tracy. He said that members from each group often meet for an "open and honest" discussion.

"The UCO does not hide. They have always been very upfront. They have reacted well to criticism, and they have oftentimes offered points of clarification," he added.

"I don't see it as 'ideological differences.' It was restructuring to make the relationship between the UCO and Campus Ministry clear. In order to lift confusion, we don't want to be seen as Campus Ministry. However, we are still under the authority of Fr. Tracy," Lozano commented. The UCO is now considered a student organization, he said.

Lozano explained that the purpose of the UCO is "to help students live a Christian life on campus and to grow in their faith." He described the group as "ecumenical, which includes Catholics and Protestants. What we teach involves what both Catholics and Protestants have in common." Currently, approximately 60 students are involved with the UCO, according to Lozano.

Tracy said that the UCO has a "strict code of authority, in that you must respect its leaders, the system and structure, not unlike that of the military. Then again, however, many people have no problems with the military.

"This will inevitably cause problems for students who are used to a free-flowing environment where decisions are much more personal and independent," he concluded.

"We are a close-knit group, and there is the possiblity of pressure. However, if there is, it is not intentional. I also think that we are close enough that we can tell each other if someone feels pressured," Becker commented.

"Neal [Lozano] stresses the importance of authority, in that young people don't respect parental or governmental authority, for example. I've never felt [as if I were] under the authority of Neal, but yet he also has more wisdom than I do," LeCause noted.

Tracy said that the UCO "does not have a method for teaching about sexuality."

"Many of our students are young and in transition. They are undergoing intense self-questioning and discovering at deeper levels their sexual consciousness and identity. An atmosphere needs to be where someone can get in touch with the God-given gift of sex. However, in closely knit groups, patterns of behavior are followed and are often taken for granted. In this case, healthy questioning cannot occur, and personal growth and development force not encouraged as natural," Tracy said.

Tracy noted that "fraternities and sororities, families and churches" are examples of other "closely knit" groups which may exhibit these behaviors.

"Our atmosphere does not reflect the military. There is no strict code of authority, and we are not fundamentalists. Labels are a problem," Lozano said.

In regards to sexuality, "men and women [in the UCO] grow in their identities as men and women," Lozano said.

"Sexuality and dating is discussed more on a personal level — it's not really mentioned at meetings. As Christians, obviously, we don't want to promote premarital sex or sexuality immortality," LeCause said.

"Some of us in UCO don't like to have a dating relationship with the guys in our group, in order to keep up the atmosphere that we're trying to create. However, everyone feels free to discuss any problems with dating or relationships with someone else in the group," Becker said.

"There is no segregation, of the sexes except for during our personal sharings groups. We think it is more natural this way. There is more emphasis on girls becoming closer to girls as friends, and vice versa," she said.

Lozano explained that the UCO conducts weekly prayer meetings on Wednesday nights. During this semester, these meetings are known as "Knowing God" seminars, during which there are "songs, sharing of faith experiences by students, teaching on basic concepts of Christianity, prayer and discussion," he said.

The UCO also sponsors an annual retreat in the Philadelphia area for its members and social events on the weekends, according to Lozano.

Tim Lowry, a junior, was involved with the UCO his freshman year and during the beginning of his sophomore year at Villanova. He said he was first approached by members of the UCO at the freshman activities forum during orientation, and he explained that he had not previously been involved with any religious youth group in high school.

"Its methods were totally foreign to me, and I really couldn't accept it. What kept me going back was the people, who were very genuine and concerned.

"However, it just wasn't for me, especially the way they relate to God. Their expression is charismatic: very verbal, praying out loud and singing," Lowry commented.

"I am more accustomed to a personal and private relationship with God. UCO is more community-oriented because they share their faith and their feelings with everyone else in the group," he noted.

"I made a lot of good friends through the UCO, and I wouldn't trade that experience. It was a challenge to me and my faith, and I learned a lot, but I didn't necessarily agree with everyting they said and did," Lowry concluded.

Pitkin was first involved with the organization in her freshman year. She attended the weekly prayer meetings, retreats and seminars, and by her junior year she became much more actively involved in the UCO. "I liked partying and everything, but sometimes I couldn't talk with my friends about things I felt, or problems I had, especially concerning God," Pitkin said.

Pitkin planned to attend law school after she graduated, but by her senior year she "realized how I'd grown in my faith, and I wanted to do something service-oriented before I went out into the world to pursue my career and make money. I considered the Peace Corps, but I decided I liked what I was doing in the UCO and chose to stay."

Phil Faranda, a senior, described his first UCO meeting as "nothing radical, but very orthodox. I was not attracted by the way the people talked about God and themselves. I asked one girl what her major was, and she said 'nursing,' but it depended on 'what God has planned' for her. She said it as though she had just gotten off the phone with Him."

Faranda said that he had been involved in a group called Antioch in high school, which he described as "a youth group geared towards Christian ministry. It is very low intensity, and it didn't overwhelm people with scripture or orthodox religion." He decided that the UCO "was not what I was looking for," so he chose not to go to any more meetings.

He said that after that time one of the leaders of UCO would come to his dormitory room once a week to inquire why he had not attended the previous meeting, and if he planned to go to the next one.

"He was very polite and I was very polite, but he just didn't get the message, and I didn't want to offend him," Faranda explained. "My problem with UCO is that the people can't take 'no' for an answer.

"The recruiters insinuate by their actions that this is the right way to go and there is no other way. If you accuse them of this, they turn around and say, 'Why are you accusing me of saying following Christ is wrong?' " he said.

"There are many ways to follow Christ. If people choose to follow Christ in another way then UCO, then UCO should respect that and go on their merry way," Faranda added. "I think that there is a danger in being loyal to men before being loyal to God."

"No one knocks on random doors. The people we contact are those who expressed an interest in UCO. And when we visit people, we aren't just doing so to get them to join the UCO — it may be done on a friendship basis. Some people may go overboard, but we don't pressure someone to join UCO if they don't want to," said Becker.

"Some people are overenthusiastic, and that's bad. Fraternities do the same thing, but the religious part scares people," Pitkin noted.

Tracy commented that "there are some faculty on this campus who want to suppress organizations like the UCO. There is a fine balance between religious tolerance/religious freedom and destructive elements in programs or movements on campus."

NROTC program sponsors fall blood drive

By PEARSE A. McDADE
Staff Reporter

The NROTC program collected 179 pints of blood in its fall semester blood drive in the ward room of John Barry Hall on Oct. 3 and 4.

Two hundred twelve people registered to take part. Thirty-two donated for the first time.

Nicole Makowski, recruitment representative for the Main Line Branch, Southeastern Pennsylvania Chapter of the American Red Cross, said that she "was very pleased" that the drive did "very well."

Makowski added that the totals were above average and that response from the University was "fantastic," citing an increase of 56 pints over the totals for the same time last year.

Maj. Rick Nealis served as an advisor to the drive and noted "more faces from the Villanova community," basing his observation on an increase in activity during "the normal slow periods" when giving blood conflicted with midshipmen's schedules.

He explained that with John Barry Hall's location "at the end of campus, we don't see many people" and credited the drive's success to better publicity.

When asked to explain why the NROTC sponsors the drive, Nealis said that the drive is a good experience for the midshipmen because it promotes community involvement and is good training for prospective Navy and Marine officers.

Michael Ferguson, a senior political science major, Marine midshipman and battalion commander, noted the "enthusiasm in the battalion" and credited the midshipmen's advertising and recruitment of friends for making the drive a success.

Makowski stressed the importance of this and other drives sponsored by the College of Nursing, the Law School and the University in providing the area with badly needed blood supplies.

She explained the critical situation by comparing the safe level of o+, the universal blood type, with the actual local supply. While, 1,600 pints is considered "safe," the real total is only 347 pints.

Noting the critical situation of blood banks in the area, Makowski invited all to register for the next drive, which will be held on Nov. 1, 2 and 3 from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. in the Villanova Room of the Connelly Center.

She explained that the procedure includes registration, some information on giving blood and the completion of a medical history in which iron levels, pulse rate and other related health indicators are checked.

While all these things are done, questions are encouraged to ensure that the donor is fully informed and eligible to participate. Topics such as AIDS are addressed so that the patient understands that with new, sterile needles for each patient, the process is safe.

Makowski asked anyone who has questions or would like to schedule an appointment to donate to call her at 525-3090.

Villanova women in calendar

By NOEL E. FALCO
News Editor

A calendar featuring female students of Villanova was released for sale in the University bookstore on Oct. 26, according to Christian Hunt, a junior involved with Perfect Publishers, the company which printed the calendar.

Hunt said the University approved the company's proposal of the calendar provided the photographs be of "high quality" and "tasteful."

The Rev. Patrick Rice, O.S.A., chairman of the University licensing committee, which reviews all requests from anyone who wants to use the University's name or logo, said the committee approved the calendar.

Photographer Bud Beson, of Fantasy Centerfold, photographed the women as part of a cooperative deal with Perfect Publishers, Hunt said.

Carole Beson, also of Fantasy Centerfold, said her company specializes in "photographing women and showing them at their best." Beson started shooting the photographs this past spring and finished this summer.

The calendar, which costs $8, is available only in the bookstore or directly through the publishing company. Hunt said the company hopes to sell the calendar not only to students, but also to parents, alumni and Main Line residents.

United Way campaign begun

Press Release

The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University President, has announced that Villanova will again step forward to assist the needy of the area by participating in the 1989 drive for United Way. The University's effort begins Oct. 31, and the target completion date is Nov. 23.

Dr. Jim McKenna, director of human organization science, and Kathleen Kerpius of the personnel office have been appointed as co-chairs for the campaign. Other campus administrators will assist in various locations.

In his charge to campus leaders, Dobbin said, "I have made a commitment to the leadership of the area United Way campaign that Villanova will again participate in this particular manifestation of our commonly accepted obligations to good works.

"The United Way is an additional way for the Villanova community to help meet the needs of people in need. A large number of agencies receive crucial support from this community effort, including several components of Catholic Social Services, and I would like to see Villanova take its proper place with other businesses and institutions in helping make this annual effort a success," added Dobbin.

Giving is made a bit more convenient by the introduction of payroll education deduction of pledges. Commitments for the campaign will be deducted from each paycheck in 1989, thus enabling many to make a larger donation than might otherwise be possible in their individual circumstances.

It is also possible to designate a particular agency to receive one's donation. When this is requested, the actual donation will be funneled through the United Way organization to the specific agency.

Senate meeting scheduled today

By KEVIN C. HEIL
Assistant News Editor

Dr. Philip A. Maurone, University Senate chairman, said student and faculty senators will be asked for their data concerning "the schools they think Villanova competes with and what they think our tuition should be next year" when the Senate meets today at 4 p.m. in the West Lounge of Dougherty Hall.

Maurone said that student senators Christopher Sperduto and Jonathan Zahm will be seated in their positions, unless there is an objection by Senate members.

The rules and review committee had discussed changes for Sperduto and Zahm, who are both transfer students. An exception to the Senate constitution has been made which will allow them to fill their Senate seats, said Maurone.

"The rules and review [committee] said 'since it was inadvertent ... we'll grant an exception for one year.' The executive committee said, 'we'll go along with that, but if someone brings up a constitutional objection, this has to be heard,' " he explained.

He also said the budget committee met yesterday to elect a new chairperson. A committee member will announce to the Senate whether the priorities from last year's budget have been met.

The Senate will also vote to elect a new executive secretary. Zahm had originally been nominated, but could not be appointed because of the rules and review committee's discussion of requirements for senators who are transfer students.

Zahm also serves as the vice president of Student Government.

The next Senate meeting is scheduled for Nov. 18.

halftime of the Villanova football game on Oct. 15. Dobbin drew the winning tickets, which were then announced by Kate Wagenmann, director of personnel of Student Government.

Paul Davis, Student Government treasurer, said, "The entire Villanova community knew what we were doing and why we were doing it. They were very cooperative — by the amount of money we raised it [the response] was tremendous."

One of the students taking a special interest in the drive was Student Senator Chris Sperduto, who sold raffle tickets in his classes. He agreed to match whatever the class bought with his own donation.

The Student Government has noted that donations may still be sent to: The Setzer Children Trust Fund, First Trust Bank, 107 Courter Ave., Ardmore, Pa. 19003.

Dobbin defines Villanova identity at inaugural

Press Release

Editor's note: This is a prepared text of the inaugural address of the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president. It was distributed to the press before Dobbin spoke.

Distinguished guests, colleagues, members and friends of the Dobbin, Augustinian and Villanova families. I thank you most sincerely for coming to share this joyful moment with me and with Villanova.

The Villanova community speaks often of its institutional mission, as most other colleges and universities are wont to do. In my remarks this afternoon I shall shift the metaphor and speak rather about my perception of Villanova's identity as a university. An institution's identity, like an individual person's identity, is something concrete, something ultimately unique. Our identity is who and what we are, have been and aspire to become. This consciousness is not merely subjective. It is embodied in the very fabric of the institution: its symbols, its charter, its mission statement, its way of life, its lore. It is fashionable today to sum these up and to speak of the institution's story. The institution's story should be told and retold to focus the community's sense of identity and commitment to its mission. Today I could not begin to tell Villanova's story. Instead I shall abstract a few essentials from that story.

1. Villanova is an American university. Founded in 1842 as Villanova College, Villanova officially became a university in 1953. We cherish our long standing membership in the community of American higher education. We desire interaction of every level with our fellow American institutions of higher learning locally, regionally and nationally. We subscribe wholeheartedly to the "Characteristics of Excellence in Higher Education" endorsed by the Middle States Association Commission on Higher Education; including intellectual freedom as well as integrity and the striving for excellence in all programs.

Since it has become a university, Villanova has continued to emphasize and to enhance the widely recognized quality of its undergraduate programs. Graduate education, which is intrinsic to a university, has been more limited in extent at Villanova. Traditionally the University's better known graduate programs have been professional programs preparing highly qualified practitioners in such fields as law, business and engineering. In recent years several of our graduate programs in the liberal arts and sciences, which originally were established primarily to prepare secondary school teachers, have developed a much more rigorous orientation toward research and scholarship. We intend to foster and considerably to amplify this development in all our programs — graduate and undergraduate — in accord with the underlying principle that there is a natural synergism between learning and research.

2. Villanova is a Catholic university. We are deeply conscious of our Catholic heritage and of our responsibility to bring the Catholic tradition to bear on the intellectual and cultural climate of our time. We see no conflict between being Catholic and being a university. Particularly as an Augustinian Catholic university we perceive a congeniality between being Catholic and being a university. St. Augustine lived centuries before the emergence of the first universities in the Middle Ages. Almost surely, however, he would have played on the etymological similarity between the Greek derived word "catholic" (which means universal) and the Latin derived word "university." Augustine always used the word "catholic" with a strong suggestion of the universality which it connotes.

3. Villanova's character as an Augustinian university transcends the institution's historical and continuing relationship with the Augustinian Order. It transcends the presence of courses, lectures and institutes devoted to Augustine's thought, desirable as these may be. It certainly transcends an uncritical advocacy of Augustine's philosophy 15 centuries after his time. It consists, rather, of certain characteristics of Augustine's thought and legacy which have become essentials of Villanova's identity, embedded in Villanova's symbols and varied forms of self-expression. They constitute much of what the members of the Villanova community mean when they speak of the "spirit of Villanova." They provide the thread of unity and the key for interpreting Villanova's mission statement. They are not unique to Villanova, as Augustine's heritage is not, but by emphasizing them Villanova actualizes its own unique identity.

4. The first of these Augustinian essentials has to do with the relationship between the mind and the heart. The centerpiece of the University's seal is a heart on fire. The heart, the perennial symbol of restless human desire, is on fire with a divinely enkindled love. It burns with the unquenchable desire to know, which ultimately only the divine can satisfy. A book recently published by Cornell University Press characterized Augustine's theory of rhetoric as "a rhetoric of desire," a "hermeneutics of love." There is a reciprocity between love and knowledge. Although love depends upon understanding, Augustine stresses conversely that love enables all human knowing and not simply that knowing born of religious love which we call faith. Even the detached, objective pursuit of the scientist is carried along by what Augustine calls "the ardent love of understanding."

Recently several prominent educators, most notably Derek Bok, the president of Harvard University, have called upon higher education to recognize the need for education in values and moral reasoning. In an Augustinian university values must provide the ambiance as well as the object of our reasoning. These underlying values must include, besides the values that we hold by consensus as Americans and as participants in the community of American higher education, the convictions mediated to us by our Catholic tradition and among these, specifically in our time, a concern for justice and peace in our society, and more generally a heightened social awareness.

5. A second Augustinian essential, related to the first, is the stress on the role of community. From the moment of his conversion, in each of the transitions of his life as a Christian — as layman, as priest, as bishop — Augustine insisted on living in community. His brand of monastic life was a blend of Christian common life with the greek common pursuit of wisdom. In several of his writings Augustine plays the role of a Christian Socrates, raising questions and sharing openly in the developing insights of the group. Villanova, of course, is not a monastic community, but it has always prided itself on its sense of community — students, faculty, staff, alumni. Villanova is and always has been a friendly place, a caring community. I think without doubt that this is due in large part to our Augustinian heritage. This same heritage challenges us in these days to deepen and to broaden that sense of community. Our academic community should even more truly be a community of discourse. Faculty interaction, the classroom and the laboratory, student life, all should reflect an openness to people and ideas, a sense of inquiry in dialogue, a critical sense, a moral and loving concern. The University seal represents these traits of an ideal Augustinian community with the inscrolled words 'unitas, veritas, caritas (unity, truth, love). In human community, unity and love lead to truth. In the University's seal the book of Sacred Scripture together with the bishop's staff upon which the flaming heart rests symbolize the Christian Catholic tradition. A keen consciousness of that tradition combined with the traits of community just outlined provide the surest key to preserving the University's Catholic identity.

Lest this emphasis on Catholic identity seem exclusive, I hasten to add, and not as an afterthought, that this is not the case. For almost a century and a half Villanova has welcomed people of other faiths. Some of our most distinguished faculty, alumni and students leaders have been of other faiths. Their presence as fully incorporated members of the Villanova family is not only welcome but essential to our mission. Recall the Augustinian stress on the universality connoted by the word "catholic." For Augustine, the truth which the Church is called to proclaim is a public truth. It is the truth for which every human heart is restless. It is not the private preserve of any group or sect. The Church's mission is to proclaim and defend that truth and then to explore it endlessly with the whole of humanity as a sounding board. In his writings Augustine often appeals to the "weighty authority of all peoples" as supporting and even enhancing the authority of Sacred Scripture and the authority of episcopal succession in the Church. As a bishop of the Church, Augustine brought the Christian message into the public forum, exposing his arguments to the gaze and critique of wide audiences. A modern Catholic university might serve this purpose well. Other Christians and people of other faiths are most welcome conversation partners in this joint pursuit of truth, both within the University and without.

show off the fact that these schools have more to offer than tall guys with great ball-handling skills," according to the Playboy press release.

Cindy Rakowitz, a Playboy spokeswoman said, "We don't consider ourselves exploitive... a lot of women are born wishing they were a Playboy playmate. We're offering these particular people an opportunity to do it."

Tracey Burke, a member of the campus group Students Against Sexual Stereotypes, said that she was upset with Playboy's intentions. She said she considers Playboy "extremely exploitative because the majority of the characteristics that make up their [the models'] personalities are lost. They are looking at the individual only as a sexual object."

Senior Dan Dougherty said, "Everyone should be allowed to establish their own morals. However, when they attend this University they are buying into the University Mission Statement. Because the premises are Villanova University, it brings shame to the University."

Junior Christopher Sperduto said, "They're not posing as naked girls. They're posing as naked Villanova girls."

The pictures in the pictorial will include clothed, semi-nude and nude photographs, according to Rakowitz. She added, "The emphasis will be on the semi-nude and nude."

Stack said, "What I dislike about Playboy as opposed to hardcore pornography is that they have legitimized it [through other articles, short stores and other content within the magazine]. They are subtly putting on to people that it's acceptable. But they're not honest about who they really are."

"Playboy is a very successful business and we have a very good reputation in the world of publishing. We're so accepted that we're the No.1 men's magazine in the world," Rakowitz said.

Dobbin said the fact that two-thirds of the schools in the Big East are Catholic creates "even more interest. I think the damage will be significant to any of the schools."

He said that as Villanova is a Catholic university, "the public sees us as being committed to a high standard of ethics."

"The fact that the majority of the schools are Catholic is incidental ... this is not a strike out at Catholicism," Rakowitz said.

Playboy interviewed students from St. John's in Jamaica, N.Y. from Oct. 19-21. The school denounced the visit, by stating, "Playboy promoted a hedonistic attitude and the University could not support that," according to Kevin Malloy, general manager of The Torch, the student newspaper.

"The publicity generated by the controversy was enough publicity for them. I saw nothing wrong with it [the advertisement searching for models]. Many girls on campus are pursuing modeling careers ... Playboy is one of the best magazines to begin that type of career," he added.

Rakowitz explained that the type of woman who would pose for Playboy will have to expect some opposition from those that disagree with her decision. She stated this as the reason that 18 is the minimum age so that the woman would be mature enough to face the consequences.

She added, "In the long run, most women who pose for Playboy end up OK. They really do. There's no real devastation in posing for Playboy."

"Any woman who is ethically responsible will see this for what it is," Dobbin said.

Nursing

There is a growing competition of sorts among health care agencies to attract nurses, O'Driscoll calls it a "pricing war" which has increased the salary of nurses locally to about $30,000 a year.

As to the reason for the nursing shortage, O'Driscoll believes it is because "women have many more opportunities today than they did in the past." Nursing used to be one of the few career choices women had. Now women are opting to choose professions that were male-dominated.

"In fact, it was not until Villanova established the College of Nursing that women were enrolled into the University and even then there was only limited enrollment of women in the other colleges of the University," O'Driscoll added.

O'Driscoll said that most of the students that attend the Career Day are junior and senior nursing students. Juniors have the opportunity to find summer positions with many of the health care agencies in order to help guide them in which direction nursing will take them.

Middle States evaluation

Lafferty said, "Villanova will be engaged in a comprehensive self-study that will begin with committees set up by the steering committee." These committees will include: mission goals and objectives, programs and curricula, educational outcomes, admissions, student services, faculty, organization and administration, governing board, strategic planning, budgeting and accounting, library and other resources, plant and equipment.

Committee membership will be decided by the steering committee, Lafferty said. She added, "[an] important component of the self-study process is that it be representative of the University community." Every committee will have a representative from administration, faculty, staff personnel and students.

Lafferty said, "I am very encouraged by the responses we have already received from various administrators, faculty, staff and students. This indicates a sincere willingness on the part of all those participating that the accreditation process will be one of substance and growth."

The last Middle States Evaluation took place in 1980. Lafferty said, "Fr. Driscoll [the Rev. John M., former University president], after 1980, began the planning process through the PEC report for the upcoming Middle States evaluation.

"Much of the work done from the PEC will provide a basis for the self-study process," Lafferty said.

Dobbin said, "No new problems should surface that we're not already aware of." The study, he said, should give "new solutions."

"Middle States does not ask us to solve every problem but what it does expect is that we are able to outline our strengths as well as our weaknesses and then to work toward addressing those problems," said Lafferty.

Lafferty cited two major benefits of the self-study process. They were that "institutional decision-making is strengthened by ideas from people working in the institution" and "the institution as a whole becomes better understood by everyone connected with it."

Fight pornography Reject Playboy

Villanova women have a chance to make an important statement to the nation this week. We want to tell Playboy we are not interested in posing for the "women of the Big East" edition of the magazine. As students of Villanova, we want to uphold the integrity and Christian values of the University. As women, we must reject the degrading exploitation of females.

Playboy Magazine recently decided to feature women of the Big East Conference in its April 1989 issue. Six out of nine of the colleges, including Villanova, are Catholic institutions. The Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, has labeled the magazine's philosophy and practice as exploitative of women and demeaning to the reputation of the University.

We advocate the increased awareness of women's issues, such as, exploitation, inequities in pay, lack of day care, acquaintance rape and sexual harassment. We have raised questions about the lack of maternity leaves, need for a women's center and the approval of a women's studies program at Villanova. We believe that magazines like Playboy and like it exploit women as objects, not as persons.

We urge Villanova women to reject Playboy's offer.

Let's show Playboy managing photo editor Jeff Cohen that Villanova and the Big East does have more "to show off than tall guys with great ball-handling skills." Let the nation see how much respect Villanova women have for themselves, their church and their University. Let our high standards of academic, personal and spiritual integrity speak for themselves.

Langran tips 500th mark

Our hats are tipped to the winningest coach in Villanova's history, Dr. Robert Langran. He recently reached the milestone of his 500th victory as the women's tennis team beat Concordia College in a 7-2 triumph.

Langran has been the head coach for both the men's and women's tennis teams for 22 and 20 years respectively, and was instrumental in the starting of the programs. Langran is also a professor in the political science department at the University.

We applaud the dedication of Langran and the women's and men's tennis teams and watch for the future success of Villanova tennis.

Letters to the Editor

Villanovan raised awareness

To the Editor:

We were very pleased to note the Villanovan's recent attention to the date and acquaintance rape problem. The articles by Noel Falco and Jennifer Reidy were an admirable initial step to increasing awareness of the problems engendered by sexual stereotypes.

However, we are disturbed by some of the responses to those articles.

First of all, students should not be angered or amused by the articles. Date rape is a problem. Falco and Reidy presented date and acquaintance rape as aberrant and abnormal behavior; implicit in this characterization is the understanding that very few men actually commit such acts. The denial voiced in the Oct. 7 issue of the Villanovan is symptomatic of the insensitivity inherent in the date rape situation.

The denial voiced in the Oct. 7 issue of the Villanovan is symptomatic of the insensitivity inherent in the date rape situation.

Secondly, the assertion that single-sex dorms might prevent date rape misses the point entirely. Prevalence of date rape is independent of housing policies. In fact, segregation by sex promotes the role stereotyping and gender discrimination which make date and acquaintance rape prevalent on college campuses and in our society.

Feminism is not man-bashing; addressing any issue important to women is not sexist.

Thirdly, the articles do not reek of sexist feminism." Feminism is not man-bashing; addressing any issue important to women is not sexist. And this particular issue involves relations between women and men. Both sexes must examine and re-evaluate their behavior.

Finally, despite our disagreements with some of the opinions expressed, we invite the writers to continue the discussion. We meet every Monday at 5 p.m. in the Center for Peace and Justice.

Music complements Mass

By ANNE E. GRIFFITH and KEVIN C. HEIL

Saint Augustine once said, "Singing is like praying twice." As members of Campus Ministry who believe in this ideal, we are upset at the views expressed in an editorial in the Oct. 7 issue of the Villanovan accusing the music ministry of overemphasizing the music at Sunday evening masses.

Sunday Mass is the only time during the week when we can gather as one body to worship our Lord. . .together.

Amy Spencer alleges that the music ministry not only delays the end of Mass, but also excludes parishioners from taking part in the Eucharistic celebration while turning the altar into a stage on which the musicians can perform.

She states that Mass has been lengthened by nearly 25 minutes with unnecessary and often time-consuming music "rehearsals and performances." There are no real additions which constitute an extension of the service. Mass may be perhaps five minutes longer this year, but that is due to slightly longer versions of hymns which our community has been singing for years are not solely unique to the Villanova parish community.

Considering that the celebrants seem to support music ministry's efforts, they might be disappointed in finding that some of their parishioners would rather be nestled in their dorms doing homework and catching up on the latest gossip instead of devoting a few extra minutes to worshiping God.

There is ample time for quiet reflection during the Mass, and parishioners should not feel forced to join in the singing. However, the purpose of the rehearsals is to include, rather than exclude, the community, even if "they hit a wrong note."

Spencer asserts that Gary Stegall, the coordinator of music ministry, deliberately selects pieces which are too challenging for the average parishioner. However, at the first campus ministry retreat, all ministers, not solely the musicians, were able to easily follow along with the music after only one rehearsal.

Surely, not all of these people have had previous musical training, yet they seemed just as enthusiastic as did the musicians themselves. The students on this retreat may serve the Villanova parish community, but they also consider themselves the "average parishioners" to which Spencer refers.

We realize that not everyone may be comfortable singing. The music ministers, however, have chosen this form of prayer as their one true means of sharing their spirituality with the community. They are not looking to perform or receive praise for their efforts.

We find it somewhat dismaying that Spencer seeks to portray the music ministers as a group of musicians looking for a bit of self-promotion and a boost to their collective egos.

As members of campus ministry, we seek to serve the community as a whole in worshipping our God through the celebration of the Eucharist. As officially commissioned members of the Villanova parish community, it is our obligation to serve and include all who share our faith. We sincerely hope that Spencer's opinion is not that of the majority.

Sunday Mass is the only time during the week when we can gather as one body to worship our Lord . . . together. Music is simply another form of prayer and one in which we hope all parishioners will continue to participate and enjoy.

Greek stance attacked

By CRAIG ZAPPETTI

I am writing this response in reference to an article written by former Student Government president Philip Brach which appeared in the October, 1988 issue of The Pelican.

As a leader of the Greek community, I was very upset to read some of Brach's statements. This was not because of the opinion these statements presented, but because they reveal Brach's true personality and his inaccurate assessment of debatable facts.

Brach takes the results of a national study, which includes many large public universities that do not adequately regulate their Greek chapters, and applies them to our campus which is private and has a highly regulated Greek system.

Also, the only "Villanova in-house evaluation of Greek organizations" that I am aware of is the Evaluation of the Greek Organization System released in 1987. Since I am a co-chairperson of the committee which is composing a response to this report, I have read this evaluation thoroughly. I can assure that it does not state any facts similiar to the ones which Brach presented on date or group rape.

He later states that Greeks have a "self-proclaimed system of discrimination, secrecy and exclusion." The only requirements ever placed on a rushee are those which the school mandates: a minimum GPA, good disciplinary standing, etc. In terms of membership in Greek organizations being single-sexed, I can only point to the Boy Scouts, the Knights of Columbus and the Augustinian sect as examples of organizations which have similiar requirements and with which Brach is very familiar.

About a year ago, during election time, Brach came to me and asked for permission to speak at my fraternity's business meeting. I allowed him this opportunity and at our meeting he praised our efforts within the Villanova community and stated that he totally supported Greek organizations. His statements one year later do not add any credibility to a Student Government that has recently been plagued by fraudulent elections and a "cliquish' operation.

Brach states that Greeks foster anti-Christian values. I would like to state that my fraternity has taught me about courage, loyalty, and gentlemanly conduct and that it has instilled Christian ethics in my mind and soul. These ethics do not teach about deceit, disharmony or denouncement of others.

Phil, what makes you think that you are in a position to judge others? For the two years that I have known you, all that I have witnessed is a James Dean (Rebel Without A Cause) struggle for power and glory. Lay down your arms and look to the Greek community for assistance.

Looking at our involvement with the Villanova Political Action Committee, the help tht we have provided to Ed Sullivan in his quest for state senator and the leadership we have provided to many organizations throughout this campus and the Philadelphia area, I think it is safe to conclude that Greeks have many common goals with the Student Government and the University.

I would like to take this opportunity to set my agenda for the new president of the University. Father Dobbin; the Greeks present Villanova with a very active and spirited component of student life.

Please take the time in your new term to meet with us and investigate what we are all about. The more financial and personnel resources which the school commits to our organizations, the faster they will attain positive growth and continue to benefit the Villanova community.

Song prays twice

MICHELLE A. ZACCHEI

Is it silence or celebration? That is a question that I and many other Villanova students have been asking ourselves as we regretfully read a recently published article in the Villanovan, "Music must be de-emphasized."

This "oped" is one student's view on how a Mass should be conducted. In this student's dictionary, Mass could be defined as a time for a more spiritual state of mind and silent reflection, not to last more than 50 minutes once a week.

I agree that Mass should be a time for spiritual enrichment, but silent? I do not think so. Mass is a joyous celebration through which the community as a whole praises and thanks God.

When was the last party or celebration you attended that was silent? How dull any celebration (wedding, birthday, graduation or dorm party) would be without music.

My answer: If someone prefers to pray to God in silence then that person should do so but not be upset with the community when they choose to praise God in their way — in song.

Music Ministry has developed its mission this year under the superb leadership of Gary Stegall, the new director of pastoral music. Villanova is very lucky to have Stegall share his experience with our community to help the Mass meet the needs of all of the worshippers.

Behind the scenes he conducts three hours of practices with all of the musicians every week, so we will be secure with each song before the Mass begins. As pastoral musicians, we have volunteered our services to help the congregation praise God in song, if they so choose.

As a pastoral musician, I would like to take this opportunity, on behalf of all of the musicians, to thank those who appreciate the talents the musicians hold.

First of all, I would prefer to say we "share" not "showcase" our talent. Moreover, I must question the suggestion that church is not the place for sharing ourselves.

After all, it was God who bestowed the musicians with these talents. I know of no better use of these God-given talents than to share them with others as an ultimate form of worship in God's house of prayer.

To rectify an inaccurate statement in the Villanovan articles, I would like to emphasize that there are no "featured vocalists" at any of the Villanova Masses. A featured vocalist is a soloist to whom people listen for mere enjoyment of the music and the voice.

In most case, the musicians are not soloists but leaders of song. Sometimes, however, the musicians do sing without the congregation, but these times are not for people to complement the vocalists. On these occasions, we hope to provide a peaceful setting for reflection on the words of the song or for individual prayer.

Again, Stegall and the musicians work tirelessly to prepare appropriate songs which stress important issues for each Mass. Nothing is sung in the Mass without an essential spiritual message and absolutely nothing is sung to feature vocalists!

If an individual does not include song as a personal form of worship, that is perfectly acceptable. Individuality is part of God's beauty in the human race. However, please do not publicly criticize others if song is a part of their worship, as they follow recommendation of Vatican II. If the Villanova Masses, due to their inclusion of praise through song, do not fit one person's definition of Mass, there are many Masses throughout the community that might better suit that person.

I am not taking issue because I believe everything that Music Ministry does is perfect; regardless of how hard we are trying. I realize improvements can be made. I do, however, believe that if an article is written to criticize, facts must be accurate and perhaps constructive suggestions made.

Michelle A. Zacchei is a sophomore and a pastoral musician.

Refuse Playboy

To the Editor:

So many people have tried to make some headway in combating pornography, and along comes a great opportunity for the women of Villanova to exert their power in the sound of silence.

The invitation from Playboy could be answered emphatically if every girl would stay away from their convenient hotel locations and just give them the cold shoulder. No demonstrations or publicity of any kind, (they'd love that) just ignore them as though they did not exist.

They would be sure that students were being threatened by the administration, under pain of mortal sin and expulsion, not to show up; and it would drive them crazy to be met with nothing more than a solid phalanx of decency.

However, this kind of treatment would require a commitment from every girl — no three or four curious ones just testing each other to see who would really do it — or thinking it is not so bad to show yourself off in a big-time magazine — or how about Jeff Cohen the photo editor, who said, "We'd like to show off the fact that these schools have more to offer than tall guys with great ball-handling skills." What a cute come on!

People, you know what your school has to offer, you know why you selected Villanova in the first place, and I bet a nude pictorial tastefully done was not even in it.

This is not an opportunity for you, it is a make money by violating any unexploited territory in order to increase sales. Stay away from them. They will hurt you, hurt the student body and the reputation of the school itself.

Who knows, if you begin this silent campaign, it may catch on at all nine Big East schools, and the world will never see a nude pictorial of the women of this basketball conference.

Boston U. student explains policy

To the Editor:

As a Boston University student battling BU's new strict housing policy, I was disturbed by an article published in the Oct. 7 issue of the Villanovan from the College Press Service which states the policy prohibits "overnight guests of the opposite sex in their dorm rooms."

The guest policy according to a letter to BU parents from Dean of Students Ronald L. Carter states, "no overnight guest will be allowed in the residence at Boston University." Exceptions, the letter states, will be "considered" for same sex relatives and same sex prospective students.

Many students are outraged by the new policy, and some have proposed alternative solutions, including special housing and extended library hours. The administration, however, has chosen to ignore student opinion and plans to implement the policy second semester.

Please do not confuse the guest policy with a sex policy. The majority of Boston University's dorms, brownstones and apartments are coed. If one of Warren Towers' 1,500 student residents wishes to sleep over at his or her boyfriend's or girlfriend's room across the hall, the new policy cannot prevent it.

However, if a student wishes to invite his or her marketing group from outside his/her dormitory after 11 p.m. to complete their project, the guest policy will prevent it.

Since study lounges have been converted into dorm rooms, the library closes at midnight and the escort service stops at 1 a.m., BU students will have no place to study but the streets of Boston.

Inauguration lacked student support

To the Editor:

Applause and thanks to the Rev. Kail C. Ellis, dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences and Dr. Louise Fitzpatrick, dean of the College of Nursing, for their detailed and thoughtful efforts in planning the recent convocation festivities for the installation of Villanova's 31st president, the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A.

The ceremony was both moving and inspirational, in part because of the attendance of so many faculty, administration, staff, and alumni, as well as the representatives of more than 160 of the nation's colleges, universities, learned societies, and professional associations and organizations.

One group, however, was conspicuous by its absence: one can only lament the failure of Villanova students to participate actively in so significant an occasion. On a day considered important enough for the University to cancel classes, all but a meager handful of Villanova students — the majority of whom are residents — seem to have regarded the convocation merely as an opportunity to suspend the normal routine.

I am reminded once again that so-called impressive SAT scores and high school averages — about which we hear so much of recent Villanova students — do not a community of concerned and active scholars make.

Unified graduation

To the Editor:

The decision of the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president for the 1989 commencement ceremony to be unified came as a welcome announcement to all seniors who wish to graduate together as a class and not separated by academic college.

On behalf of the class of 1989 we would like to extend a sincere thanks to Dobbin for taking student interest into consideration when he deliberated over the plans for our graduation day.

Ticket distribution unfair

To the Editor:

I would like to say a few words on behalf of the students who did not obtain Villanova basketball tickets for this year's season. This year's ticket sales by the Basketball Club was an unorganized and unjust farce.

Each individual in the student body should have an equal opportunity to purchase tickets. This year's sales, which started at 10 a.m. on Oct. 10 and concluded by 11:30 a.m. as a sellout, did not allow the students who had classes at that time the equal chance to purchase tickets as did their fellow classmates.

It was bad enough that the basketball Club hoarded all the tickets and priced them at a ludicrous price of $100 for the season package, they also made that price include the club fees. Thus, the purchaser was forced to join the Basketball Club in order to see our Wildcats in action. The Basketball Club could have at least showed some common courtesy to the students by distributing these tickets evenly, as it was done the previous year by sign-up sheets.

What happened if you decided not to pay the $100 for the Basketball Club fees, a T-shirt, all the home games, two Spectrum games (which were included in last years package) and two Palestra games?

You could have paid $78 for all the home games, minus the "extras," if you knew that they had been on sale at the ticket office for the past week. Of course, it was unknown to the public that these tickets were on sale, because the basketball Club failed to announce that the sales of these tickets were taking place.

As a student who pays the $75 activity fee annually to this prestigious institution, I feel that the money I put into this University is more than enough to cover the costs of all tickets to our sporting events.

If the University of Pittsburgh can do it, why can't we? We as students should not be made to sit at a hectic, uninformative meeting to be told that it is all or nothing.

I think that the University, the Athletic Department and the Basketball Club should take a good, long look at the organization, the distribution, the advertisement and the sales of Villanova basketball season tickets. Perhaps, they could learn a thing or two from the Wildcat Club.

"All My Children" creator speaks

By MEGAN GUIDERA
Staff Reporter

What is it that makes mothers put their children down for naps early each day? What makes office workers take late lunches? What makes students flock to lounge televisions in the afternoons? Perhaps one reason is soap operas.

Everyone wants to know what Erica did now, who is cheating on whom and who done it? Soap operas have been addictive since the days of radio. Over four million people watch afternoon soaps each day.

On Oct. 9, Agnes Nixon, "queen of daytime drama," spoke to a local organization called The Friends of Easttown Library, in Berwyn.

Nixon lives on the Main Line with her husband. She is 60 and has raised four children. While doing all of this, Nixon also created three Emmy award winning soap operas: "All My Children," "One Life to Live" and "Loving."

According to Nixon, the characters evolve from the writer's imagination and personal influences, and are further developed by the actors themselves.

Nixon's strong imagination began at age three when she cut out comic strips and created her own stories for the comics. Nixon did a great deal of acting in high school to further develop her creative spirit. However, her career truly took off when she began to work for Irna Phillips, creator of "Guiding Light."

Phillips and Nixon wrote for both radio and television. Together they wrote and created "As the World Turns." In 1968 ABC asked Nixon to create her own show. The result was "One Life to Live." This was easy for Nixon to do while she raised her family, because she simply mailed in the script; television was not as complex as it is today.

Nixon did free-lance writing for different day-time television dramatic shows, such as "Search for Tomorrow" and "Another World." Nixon has been a guest writer for The New York Times and TV Guide.

In January of 1970, ABC asked Nixon to create a second soap opera. The result was "All My Children." This soap, which has been running for 19 years, is the one that Nixon claims is "closest to her heart."

Nixon explained to the audience that there is a great deal of work that goes into the creation of a soap. The first major task is to create a theme.

The theme of "All My Children" is based on the biblical concept of the brotherhood of man. Nixon, who is a strong Catholic, believes that struggles in society are rebellion against the common bond of mankind. She tries to incorporate this theme into "All My Children."

After the theme of a soap opera is created, the setting, characters, story line and long-term story projection must be developed.

"All My Children" is set in the fictitious town of Pine Valley. Nixon took her interpretation of the Delaware Valley, or the Main Line, and yielded Pine Valley.

According to Nixon, the characters evolve from the writer's imagination and personal influences, and are further developed by the actors themselves.

Nixon explained that the life of a soap opera actor is not all that glamorous. The day begins at 8 a.m. with line rehearsals, blocking and dress rehearsals, and ends at about 8 p.m. with taping and receiving lines for the next day.

Although television is a tedious and complex business, Nixon feels that it can benefit the public. She has demonstrated this belief through using controversial story lines on "All My Children" to heighten the awareness of society.

"All My Children" has run plots using themes such as drugs, prostitution, alcohol abuse, child abuse, gambling addiction and, more recently, a story of a heterosexual contracting AIDS.

Nixon believes these story lines increase awareness and help those in trouble with their problems.

According to Nixon, the soap opera world is an exciting one. It is full of imagination, glamour, passion and intrigue. To Nixon, "Every day is opening night."

Alumni . . . a return to alma mater

By KAREN IOVINO
Staff Reporter

Today marks the beginning of Villanova's annual Homecoming Weekend. Many events have been planned by various campus organizations to welcome back alumni, and to entertain both alumni and students alike.

The weekend kicks off tonight with a Homecoming dance, sponsored by the Association of Commuting Students (ACS). The dance will be held from 9 to 11 p.m. in the Villanova Room in Connelly Center. Attire for the event will be semi-formal. Tickets are $6 per person or $10 per couple, and are on sale at the door.

On Saturday, the Villanova football team faces the University of Richmond. Kickoff is at 1:30 p.m. Before the game, the Blue Key Society is holding a tailgate for returning alumni. Saturday evening, Blue Key is hosting an alumni reception at 8 p.m. in Connelly Center.

The football game is the main focus of Homecoming Weekend, and at halftime the 1988 Homecoming King and Queen will be crowned. Voting for the king and queen began the week before fall break and continued up until Tuesday.

The Villanova Student Union sponsored the voting, and will present the Homecoming Court at a reception on Friday night. The reception will be attended by select faculty, students, and alumni, and will be held from 7-9 p.m. in the Main Lounge in Connelly Center. At halftime at the football game, the Homecoming King and Queen will be presented for the first time to the attending crowd.

Coming home to 'Nova

By ANNE LOMBARDI
Staff Reporter

According to Robert Capone, director of alumni, Villanova grduates will be coming from such faraway places as Hong Kong, Mexico and England to participate in the Homecoming activities this weekend.

Capone said that the strong campus community is what lures alumni back for class reunions and Homecoming weekends. Many alumni have children presently attending Villanova whom they can visit while catching up with their own class friends.

Villanova's alumni office actively promotes the return of alumni by hosting dinners, lectures and other events for the weekend. Throughout the rest of the year, regional alumni clubs gather for lectures and programs presented by Villanova faculty and administration.

Capone said that the largest expected return will be the 1988 graduating class. The reason for this, said Capone, is what he calls a "three year social schedule." As undergraduates move through the four years, it is common to have friends in the class ahead and the class below. This situation makes it very welcoming for the most recent alumni to return.

"There are very few graduates that do not miss the Villanova community when they leave. No matter how intelligent or capable a student may have been, when he or she gets out into the working world, it is just like being a freshman again. Many graduates have many of the same experiences, and this is what gathers people together at Homecoming events," Capone said.

However, Capone also notes that one year after graduation, the class is happy to be with the older alumni because "a person is a student for only four years but an alumnus forever." Graduates have often developed deep relationships but they do not see one another on a daily or even weekly basis as they did during their four

Against all odds, student receives national award

By NORMA LAMANA

In April 1989, Ron Brooks — singer, actor, disc jockey, coach and public speaker — will travel to Chicago to receive the Alexis de Tocqueville Society Award, in recognition of his many services as a national volunteer. The award is presented to one person each year, and in the past has been awarded to Pete Rozelle, Henry Ford and Bob Hope. For Brooks, this honor comes after a series of such distinctions, more proof that as Brooks puts it, "just because you have no legs, that does not mean you cannot function."

Brooks was born severely handicapped; he was crippled, deemed mentally retarded and it was thought that he would never hear, see or speak. He was immediately given up for adoption and grew up in St. Edmund's Home for Crippled Children in Rosemont, where he underwent extensive speech, occupational and music therapy.

Brooks himself used the music therapy to forget his handicap, and to touch the lives of others. Almost instantly, he began overcoming the obstacles of his own handicap and the shortsightedness of society. "Once they taught me to talk," Brooks recalls, "they learned there was no way to stop me."

Brooks' singing career began early and lasted throughout his schooling, in spite of major surgery and predictions that he would never sing again. Though he was later transferred often from one institution to the next, he always remembered the kindness of the volunteers, saying, "the one thing they taught us in the institution was how to love."

After his legs were amputated, Brooks resolved to win his fight against the limits of his handicaps. He was prepared by the Augustinian brothers and Villanova volunteers to receive the sacraments; afterward he joined the Boy Scouts of America at St. Edmund's. "I used the scouting

THE FIVE-YEAR MISSION IS CANCELED!

Dare Night leads to whipped cream fight

By MARIA LOVETT
Staff Reporter

The scene: a college student inhales chocolate pudding from a bowl on the floor without the use of his hands. Is his how Villanova students dine in the "Pit"? No, this is Dare Night!

On Oct. 6 at 7 p.m., the Villanova Union sponsored Dare Night, a spin-off of "Double Dare," the television game show for kids. The host, portrayed by Chris Ippolito, led six teams through a series of ridiculous questions and hideous dares to find out who would be the "dare-ing" champion.

Six teams, the Blue Key Society, Orientation/Special Olympics, ACS, IFC/Panhellenic Council, the Villanova Union and RSA battled through raw eggs, whipped cream, and slimy gummy worms to try to win the game. In the final round the Villanova Union managed to win.

The rules of the game were very simple. Each team was given a question, and if they answered correctly they earned one chip. The team with the most chips at the end of the game won. If, however, the team answered incorrectly (which was usually the case), the team had to complete a dare. The audience judged if the team members had satisfied the requirements of the dare.

A member from each team was instructed to find a piece of bubble gum at the bottom of a whipped cream pie and blow a bubble.

The Orientation/Special Olympics team ran around the stage acting like mad scientists for one of their dares. The RSA team was dared to sing the Rocky theme song and demonstrate their boxing ability. Kissing a member of the audience or an opponent for 20 seconds was a dare that failed for the Villanova Union.

The final round was the triple dare round. A member from each team was instructed to find a piece of bubble gum at the bottom of a whipped cream pie and blow a bubble. The first team to blow a bubble won three chips.

The six teams madly slurped whipped cream up off the floor searching for the bubble gum. None of the teams could manage to blow a bubble! Finally, after quite a bit of chewing the Villanova Union blew a big bubble to become the Dare Night champions!

As an appropriate conclusion to Dare Night, the teams doused the host with whipped cream, leaving everyone on stage sticky!

program to send a message to people," Brooks said.

In the course of his school and scouting career, he achieved numerous distinctions; he joined the wrestling team despite the warnings of his coach, sang in the choir and chorus, and involved himself greatly in the audio-visual department. Additionally, in each school he attended, he was exposed to the insecurity of teenage life, and his concern for the depression and drug/alcohol abuse of his classmates led him to serve as an informal youth counselor.

Brooks went against the odds to attain the rank of Eagle Scout. He completed 23 merit badges to achieve the title, and a year later completed his Eagle Project, engineering a show put on by scouts that traveled to nursing homes in New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

Since then, he has spoken before the House of Representatives and the Senate, been invited to the White House, sung at 76ers games and Phillies games as well as at Villanova events.

"I vowed," said Brooks, "to touch other souls through music, speaking, and plays." Here at V.U. Ron is an active part of campus both academically and socially: he won the right to live on campus when he first came, and his fight resulted in increased facilities for the handicapped. Brooks encourages all students to keep on helping and to do even more, saying, "We all have disabilities, physical or emotional."

In 1987, the BSA notified Brooks and his family that he had received an honor presented to five people every four years — the Outstanding Young American Award. Ron Brooks has thus far been the only student of Villanova University to receive this award; he has since been asked to speak for the United Way, corresponded with President Reagan, and done television commercials.

It is difficult to predict what new doors will open for him with his latest remarkable achievement, the Tocqueville Award. Though Brooks is proud of his honors, he is, nonetheless, eager to continue his work toward greater appreciation of all people for one another. His fight is far from over. "Find a way to be the best you can be, and don't ever give up," Brooks advises other students. "Don't ever take anything for granted."

years at Villanova.

Homecoming weekend provides the opportunity to find out what is happening in the lives of their friends. Capone also said that there is so much to talk about that returning alumni sometimes make a list of questions they want to ask each other.

Although many students returned to their hometowns after graduation, students find the five-county area surrounding the campus attractive and often carve out lives for themselves locally.

Economically, Capone believes it makes sense for students to stay local because of the upper-level industries, the location of a major city and the upscale quality of life on the Main Line. Some of the brightest graduates may accept jobs that take them thousands of miles away, but they miss the campus so much they come back for Homecoming weekends.

Capone believes that undergraduates develop a strong attraction for community and the area. He also states that the Villanova Augustinians hve doné a tremendous job of "maintaining place and identity for their students and the campus."

An especially loyal group of alumni are the first women graduates who were mostly nursing students or professors' daughters. Capone (class of '62) claims that when he attended Villanova, these women had many more social restrictions than the men, which made their four years more difficult. With increasing pressure from alumni with daughters who wanted to attend Villanova, the campus became co-educational after 1965.

"There are very few graduates that do not miss the Villanova community when they leave. No matter how intelligent or capable a student may have been, when he or she gets out into the working world, it's just like being a freshman again."
Robert Capone, director of alumni

Many graduates share an admiration of Villanova students themselves, regarding the number of activities they are involved in and their enthusiasm to run the organizations of which they are members. "Visitors to campus find remarkable the students" offers of assistance, their ability to handle themselves well, and their cheerful and bright personalities."

Capone concluded by saying that he was once asked what is the best quality of Villanova University. He answered, "Above the administration, the faculty, the academic colleges and programs — the strongest suit of this University is the student body."

MELISSA MOURTZANAKIS

Melissa Mourtzanakis is a senior marketing major who comes to Villanova from Silver Spring, Md. Melissa is a sister in Alpha Chi Omega Sorority, where she has been on the standards board, the pledge guidance board and a rush leader. She currently serves as president of the organization.

Melissa has also been very active in the Greek community where she has served as the Greek Week chairperson for two years. This experience has led her to believe that, "Lambda Chi is definitely the team to beat . . . they're my heroes." Melissa has also served Villanova as the Special Olympics Committee chairperson for two years.

Not only does Melissa organize athletic events — she is also quite an athlete. She has been praised by many of her close friends as a world class shopper. A recent spree left Melissa temporarily disabled as a result of falling through a department store window (ground floor, luckily). When asked how this incident happened, Melissa replied from her hospital bed, "I thought it was the exit door."

For all of her accomplishments and her dedication to the Villanova community, The Order of Omega salutes Melissa Mourtzanakis as the Greek of the Week.

Vasey premieres second play

By LUCI A. JANKOWSKI
Staff Reporter

Villanova Theatre's second production in its "Celebration of Women Through Theatre Season" is "Still Life," Emily Mann's award winning play. "Still Life" is a gripping documentary taken from the actual testimonies of Mark, a Vietnam veteran, Cheryl, his wife and Nadine, his mistress. The play explores the horror of the war in Vietnam and how it affected the men, their wives, their families and our country.

The characters have their own stories to tell or points to make about their experiences of the war and its aftermath. The characters relate that story directly to the audience in an interweave of their three monologues. There is very little dialogue between the characters themselves; however, each listens to the other's story and is inspired by what the other said to reveal a specific aspect of their own agenda. At times, it is difficult to follow the train of thought of the characters, especially when they are each addressing a different topic.

Mark (Stephen Hatzai) has been severely affected by his experiences during the war and has been reliving the war since he returned home. He relives it by beating his wife, picking fights with people on the street and drinking and taking drugs. For Mark, the war is saved forever in his mind, but he also saved it in the gruesome photographs that he took while in Vietnam and in the "souvenirs" or personal belongings that he brought back from people he had killed. Mark carries with him an immense guilt for what he did in Vietnam and he punishes himself for it every day. All he can do is rationalize what he did and hope that someday he can come to terms with the whole experience.

Cheryl (Gerre Garrett) lives in constant fear of the violence that her husband is capable of, especially towards her. She has been beaten so many times that she does not even feel like she belongs in her own home — she feels like an intruder because Mark has taken over it and her. At times she is even afraid to tell Mark how she feels or what she thinks because of what he might do to her. Regardless of the beatings, Cheryl manages to hang on to some thread of their marriage, perhaps because of their children. She even tries to protect Mark from things that trigger his violent responses. Cheryl mainly blames the war for Mark's actions but that still does not justify them to her.

The characters have their own stories to tell or points to make about their experiences of the war and its aftermath.

Nadine (Susan Trimble) is Mark's mistress and confidant. Nadine has a very strong personality and offers moments of comic relief, which are a necessary element in this powerful and emotional production. She is a sophisticated, know-it-all who understands and defends all of Mark's actions. "Everything Mark did was justified ... We've all done it at some time in our lives." Nadine is the character who perhaps shocks the audience the most by her unconditional acceptance of Mark's actions and by her challenging statements which make the characters' situations very real to each member of the audience. She also asks the audience perhaps the most important question of the entire play, that is, how do we perceive Mark?

That question is one that the audience will answer for themselves as they experience the play. The audience in "Still Life" is an integral part of the action of the play. The feeling one gets as a member of the audience is that the three characters are on trial before us or are on trial before society. The characters present their "evidence" through the stories of their lives as they relate them directly to the audience and through slides. The set even reflects this feeling by using a long, wooden conference table, wooden chairs of a courtroom style and water pitchers. The set extends to the first row seats to emphasize the audience's involvement.

The actors' performances were excellent and incredibly well done considering the demanding nature of each of the characters. The peaks and valleys of emotion portrayed by the actors were so convincing that one felt as if the experiences were actually their own. The actors also made great use of their space on the set and their contact with the audience.

The Vietnam War is not over for many Americans. Some wish it were, while others need to remember so that it will not happen again. In the play, Nadine said, "He brought the war home and none of us could look at it. We still can't." It is not the typical "happy ending" play, but it is reality. Some parts of the play, particularly some slides, may be distasteful. However, it is still well worth seeing.

"Still Life," directed by Irene Baird, will be shown from Oct. 25 to 30. Tickets are available at the Vasey Theatre Box Office weekdays from 1 to 5 p.m. or call 645-7474. Student discounts are available.

Evil force lurks on stage in Philadelphia

By KATHRYN QUIGLEY
Entertainment Editor

There is an evil force lurking on the stage in Philadelphia and her name is Coco. She wears a floppy hat and speaks with a charming French accent, but she is bad to the bone. Coco gets what she wants — even if it is a hospital that has 100 elevators and only treats hand cancer.

Evil Coco is the lead character in The Soubrettes in "Evil Coco and Other Primal Urges," which is playing at the Second Space Theatre of the Society Hill Playhouse. The Soubrettes are a trio of actresses (Susan Cinoman, Lenny Daniels and Jill Tarnoff) sho perform comedy sketches in the area. Cinoman is the creator and head-writer (she gets some help from Patrick Tranter and the other members) of the Soubrettes.

"Evil Coco ..." is the second show the Soubrettes have performed at the Second Space Theatre and the first that has had a theme ... sort of. The plot of Evil Coco begins and ends the show, and pops up in the middle. Most of the show, though, is comprised of short scenes with the actresses playing various roles.

Each Soubrette has her own style: Cinoman's characters are either very good or very evil; Daniels' take no b.s. from anybody and Tarnoff is best when she portrays spoiled brats and catty women.

After Evil Coco reveals her plan-desire to run a hospital with 100 elevators, Tarnoff comes on stage to perform "Pavanne for a Dying Princess." "I want a white SAAB!!!!" with white vinyl upholstery and matching white tape deck, she whines. She tells the audience why she deserves this car: she got her marketing degree from Temple and has a job as an assistant buyer at Bloomie's. "And besides, I'm dying," she whimpers as she expires in very dramatic Camille fashion.

The next notable skit is "An Hysterics Guide to Dating." Cinoman explains that an hysteric is one who focuses on the important things in life: "obsession, conquest and pain." Daniels pretends to be a man professing his love, "I find you very beautiful," to which Tarnoff shrieks (hysterically, of course) "What do you mean by that? Why do you want to hurt me?"

Daniels really shines in "The Ms. Professional America Contest," in which she portrays Ms. Finance, whose talent is being an obnoxious bank teller. "Got any I.D.? I can't cash that without I.D.," she says.

In Act II, Cinoman is a bimbo doing "Bimbo Rap" and a frustrated pilgrim in "A Coupla Pilgrim Chicks Sitting Around Talking."

"Aerobics" and "Three Cooks" are easily the two best skits in the show because, not only do they contain some of the best writing, they contain the best ensemble acting.

In "Aerobics," Cinoman and Tarnoff are two girls waiting for the bus after their exercise workout. They whine about how fat they are (they aren't) and their bulimia — to the mild interest of the bag lady (Daniels) sitting next to them on the bench. "I never eat and I get soooo fat!" one proclaims while Daniels softly says, "I never eat."

Tarnoff is Nancy Lee, a performance artist "for petites only" in "Three Cooks." Cinoman is a spaced-out Marilyn Monroe who prepares "Apple-Percodan pie" and Daniels is Cajun Geechee, whose main ingredients are cadavers.

The show ends with Coco giving up her hospital to run a maid service that is really a theft ring.

The writing in "Evil Coco ..." is both weird and witty. The actresses are hysterical and the combination of the two makes this a must-see.

The last performances of "Evil Coco ..." are tonight and tomorrow at 8 p.m. The Second Space Theatre is located at 507 South 8th St. For information, call 923-0210.

Jodie Foster saves a weak "Accused"

By LEONARD ELLIS

"The Accused"
Directed by Jonathan Kaplan
Paramount Pictures

Drunk and uninhibited Sarah Tobias (Jodie Foster) is gang-raped by three men in a dollar-a-beer bar in "The Accused" directed by Jonathan Kaplan. Assistant District Attorney Katheryn Murphy (Kelly McGillis) is assigned the case. At the outset, it looks simple: the rapists are old enough to know that rape is a felony. Try, convict and jail them.

However, other facts sour Katheryn's sense of the case's merits. Sarah was intoxicated, smoked some pot, was interested in coupling with one of her assailants, and was suggestively dressed.

Further, Katheryn's pre-trial preparation reveals Sarah's lifestyle, including a prior cocaine bust, multi-partner sex, alcohol boosters, and a living arrangement with a junkie. This prompts Katheryn to cellophane her case with a cheap plea bargain.

Sarah reacts to the city's (Katheryn's) tax on her self-worth by mangling her hair. Katheryn is unmoved. When a witness harasses Sarah into her self-destruction, Katheryn finally presses the case with the imagination and care that Sarah deserved.

The lead actress in "Accused" is McGillis, whose commercial debut was impressive in Peter Weir's "Witness." Weir wisely treated McGilis like an ingenue. He took care to limit her time on camera when she was not speaking, and limited the lines she had to deliver.

After "Witness," McGillis chose poor roles or allowed directors to misuse her. In "Top Gun," she was the vavoom physics instructor seduced by Tom Cruise. A sexier choice would have dressed her at a level suitable to the instructor's intelligence and had her date the most conscientious fighter jock, Val Kilmer, before succumbing to the loose Cruise character.

McGillis has top billing, but she squanders any interest we have in her with a bland delivery.

In "Accused," McGillis has top billing but she squanders any interest we have in her with a bland delivery. Advisory to McGilis, the best actresses (Katharine Hepburn, Greer Garson, Meryl Streep, and Christine Lahti) deliver or delivered anger bordering on tears when they are provoked on film. If you do not show the same ability soon you will be relegated to "A" character and "B" leading parts. Those parts pay very little and accrue very little recognition for women in film today.

Jodie Foster's work in "The Accused," weighed against performances in movies released this year, merits an Academy Award nomination for Best Actress. Tom Topor's ("Nuts") weak script required a believable Sarah to save the movie from telling a message of women exploited. First, Sara is exploited during the rape. And second, Katheryn and Sarah are exploited when Katheryn's plea bargain with male attorneys defending males deprives Sarah of seeing the assailants put away forever.

Foster overcomes her director and script in every demanding scene. Sarah is fragile and frightened during the cold post-rape testing in the emergency room. A noteworthy scene is when she telephones her mother hoping to receive some understanding, but receives a cold denial instead. Afterword, Sarah restores her emotional wall of independence. Also known by her license plate moniker "Sexy Sadie," she sheds her sex-seeking unfeeling boyfriend, and shames a troubled bystander to act responsibly. She also tells her story in court.

Finally, in a witness' courtroom account of the rape, the events of the rape are finally played for the viewer. In this account, Sarah is relaxed, coy, flirt, threatened, trapped, brutalized and traumatized before she can escape.

Director Kaplan may have corroborated Sarah's backroom rape, a television plays a boxing match.

Foster overcomes her director and script in every demanding scene.

Jodie Foster captures the brutalization of Sarah and goads us to seek the redemptions of other Sarahs and ourselves. The rest of "The Accused" is unsure of or does not care about Sarah's or our rights.

Hanks and Field stand up for "Punchline"

By EDWARD ALVARADO
Staff Reporter

"Punchline"
Directed by David Seltzer
Columbia Pictures

Nineteen-eighty-eight should most be remembered as the year Tom Hanks finally reached full-star status. After years of being underrated, he is finally getting the acclaim he deserves. He received universal raves earlier this year with the summer blockbuster "Big," in which he played a 12-year-old boy trapped in the body of a 35-year-old man. Now in "Punchline," he shows us just how versatile an actor he can be.

"Punchline" succeeds as a very entertaining movie largely due to the efforts of Tom Hanks.

As Steven Gold, a failed medical student trying to make it as a stand up comic, Hanks is cast against type. Gold is not like the charming, likeable characters Hanks has played in previous films such as "Splash," "Dragnet" and "Nothing In Common." Rather, Hanks portrays him as a moody, obnoxious neurotic who performs stand-up comedy to the point of obsession.

"Punchline," written and directed by David Seltzer (screenwriter of "The Omen," "Lucas," and "Table For Five," is about the world of comedy clubs and the stand-up comics who perform there, hoping one day to hit the big time of "Carson" and "Letterman."

The movie centers around the New York comedy club "The Gas Station," where struggling stand-up comics practice their craft. In addition to Hanks' ex-medical student, there is a housewife (Sally Field), a high school history teacher and a male comic whose whole act is being a singing nun.

The film is very effective at

The new season is here

By STEPHEN POWERS
Staff Reporter

The new television season is finally here, and the three networks are slowly rolling out their new series. Network viewing was down seven percent during the 1987-88 season, and programming executives hope that a variety of new series will help to stop the viewers' defection to cable and independent stations. What follows are capsule reviews of some of the hopefuls that have already premiered over the past few weeks.

EMPTY NEST (Saturday, 9 p.m., NBC): This promises to be one of NBC's biggest hits of the new season. Produced by Susan Harris, the brainchild behind the blockbuster "Golden Girls," "Nest" focuses on widowed Miami pediatrician Harry Weston (former "Soap" star Richard Mulligan) and his two adult daughters (Kristy McNichol and Dinah Manoff), who drop by frequently to take care of him.

Despite its shortcomings, "Nest" is sure to find success under Harris' direction

The pilot episode, which aired two weeks ago, was not great, but few pilots ever are. It mostly served to introduce the characters and provide some laughs and accomplished both. Mulligan, with his laid-back acting style, is the perfect catalyst for funny situations and McNichol is also good as Barbara, an outgoing police officer. However, Manoff, a veteran Broadway performer, must think that she is still on the stage with the way she shouts her lines and rolls her eyes. She tries too hard to convince us that her character, the divorced Carol, is neurotic and unhappy with life. A more subdued approach to the role is in order.

Also on hand is David Leisure, best known for his "Joe Isuzu" TV commercials, as an obnoxious neighbor. Leisure's appearance seems to be nothing more than stunt casting, while Park Overall, as Harry's feisty nurse, LaVerne, promises to be this show's Estelle Getty, with the same kind of hilarious one-liners.

Despite its shortcomings, "Empty Nest" is sure to find success under Harris' direction. If she can bring the writing up to "The Golden Girls' " standards, she may find herself with another critical hit, as well as a commercial one.

ROSEANNE (Tuesdays, 8:30 p.m., ABC): Sandwiched between "Who's the Boss" and "Moonlighting," this sitcom is supposed to be the runaway hit of the year. Stand-up comedienne Roseanne Barr plays a working wife and mother who presides over her household in a very un- "Cosby"-like fashion; she yells, complains, uses bad grammar and is definitely not a picture perfect mother like Clair Huxtable.

In fact, this blue-collar comedy is produced by Carsey-Werner, the team responsible for "The Cosby Show." It is well-written, although the large amount of anti-male humor could be a turn-off to some, and the stories focus on the same kinds of everyday situations that used to be Cosby's trademark. Most of the supporting cast turns in good performances, although John Goodman, a talented character actor, is wasted as Roseanne's dopey husband, Dan.

Now, if only Roseanne Barr could act. Doing stand-up comedy is not necessarily a qualification for an acting job, and this is definitely true in Barr's case. She delivers every line in the same flat, monotone voice that quickly becomes annoying, and the only time she ever becomes energized is when doing scenes based on her nightclub act. Roseanne, you may be a "domestic goddess," but you had better sign up for some acting lessons — fast!

BABY BOOM (Wednesdays, 9:30 p.m. NBC): This comedy is based on last spring's hit movie of the same name. It has the same producers, the same writers, most of the same supporting cast and even the same baby. What it does not have is Diane Keaton, the original film's star who is not the slightest bit interested in doing a TV series. Instead, Kate Jackson takes over the role of J.C. Wiatt, the self described "Tiger Lady" who finds herself juggling a successful career and a family when she "inherits" her late cousin's daughter.

The producers claim that they are not doing television, but are making mini-movies. The show is, in fact, beautifully filmed, has a rich soundtrack, and is devoid of a laugh track. The episodes, which are divided into several subtitled segments (a la Woody Allen), are amusing enough, but the one problem the series has is its star. Kate Jackson is one of the most likeable performers on TV, but she portrays J.C. as easy-going and warm-hearted, when the character is supposed to be a ruthless businesswoman. How many people would consider Jackson to be a "Tiger Lady?" Not many will after they see just a few minutes of one episode, and this could be the show's downfall.

R.E.M.'s hits released

By BILL CARR AND MICHAEL AIMETTE
Staff Reporters

R.E.M., the self-proclaimed "band you grew up with," released a greatest hits compilation, the pretentiously titled Eponymous. Since R.E.M. left I.R.S. Records, the abandoned label decided to exploit the band's recent popularity with this enigmatic record; a record spanning the group's six years of recording.

Since R.E.M. left I.R.S. Records, the abandoned label decided to exploit the band's recent popularity. . .

Eponymous is a fairly predictable mixture of R.E.M.'s best known, but not necessarily best songs; it does contain a few surprises however. The first is the original "punk" version of "Radio Free Europe," a version that bassist Mike Mills thinks "squashes the other one like a grape." Another surprise is the original take of "Gardening At Night," where, believe it or not, you can actually comprehend the words!

R.E.M. inexplicably throws in an old outtake gong, titled "Romance," which certainly was not a hit for the band, but is bound to please avid fans. Actually, its inclusion is probably an inducement for fans to buy a disc full of songs they already have.

Despite its cheap marketing scheme, Eponymous is a great album containing some of the best music in the 80s.

Obviously, the hits are there: "The One I Love," "End of The World . . .," "So. Central Rain," and "Fall On Me," but there are some notable exceptions. The most evident is "Superman," but its exclusion is probably due to the fact that R.E.M. did not write it. The disc is also far too short — another 30 minutes of music would have sufficed.

Despite its cheap marketing scheme, Eponymous is a great album containing some of the best music in the '80s. However, R.E.M. is just not a "singles" group; the songs sound better in the context of their respective albums. Though it does provide a good sampling for first-time listeners, many people who will buy this disc probably already own R.E.M.'s first five albums and will buy it for a couple of unspectacular re-mixes. It just is not worth it.

MORE VIDEO FOLLIES. Did anyone catch the oh-so relevant MTV Top One Hundred Videos Of All Time Countdown last weekend? As anyone would expect, Def Leppard's recent chart-smashing single "Pour Some Sugar On Me" was voted the best video of all time. Cynics may scoff at this choice and say the only reason the Def Leppard video won was that the song "Pour Some Sugar On Me" is currently very popular and that the video gets tremendous airplay on MTV. But these cynics shall soon hold their tongues after they have carefully viewed and reviewed the Leppard video. Then, after regarding it with an open, objective mind, the breath-taking originality and innovativeness of the video will shine through. The cynic will witness: concert footage of the band, backstage footage of the band, generous camera pans of the crowd watching and cheering the band, and yes, even hot babes. How, then, will the cynic still be able to deny the artfulness, the complete novelty of the video masterpiece, "Pour Some Sugar On Me?"

Really, to acknowledge "Pour Some Sugar On Me" as Best Video Ever is just plain ridiculous. Whoever is responsible should be slapped. Granted, some truly creative, breakthrough videos did get their due respect in the countdown, such as "Thriller" and "Sledgehammer." Buy why were original and derivative videos given equal representation? Oh well, no use getting one's feathers too ruffled over it — it is only MTV, after all.

THE BANGLES LOSE THEIR HEADS: "Are we insane, or is this good?" asked Vicki Peterson of The Bangles, regarding their third album, Everything. Judging by the recent Philadelphia Inquirer review of it, insanity might be their only plea. More in the future . . .

Robert Plant withstands test of time

By VICKI DI STEFANO
Staff Reporter

"Non Stop Go" - the slogan for Robert Plant's tour of North America accurately describes his electrifying performance at the Spectrum on Oct. 21.

Veteran rocker Joan Jett opened the show with her band, the Blackhearts. Slamming into "Light of Day," a Bruce Springsteen tune from the movie of the same name in which she co-starred with Michael J. Fox, Joan Jett's vocal eminence overcame that mediocre Spectrum acoustics. Jett's sets reflected her 13-year recording career. Bad Reputation, her first solo album, was represented by a sing-along version of "I Love Rock and Roll," which she immediately followed up with a delicate rendition of her Tommy James remake, "Crimson and Clover."

Bursting with energy, Jett tore into original, all new material from her current album, Up Your Alley. "I Hate Myself for Loving You" was enthusiastically received by the audience. A song which has yet to receive the airplay it deserves, "Little Liar," stilled the crowd. This Jett tune is uncharacteristically subtle and sounded great due to Ricky Byrd's delicate guitar playing.

"The Tall Cool One," as Robert Plant has been nicknamed, proved that his voice and stage presence have withstood the test of time. He remained in perpetual motion onstage, his movements gave special emphasis to every song.

A rotating screen in the shape of a bullseye enhanced the show with visual montage from film sources which ranged from polka dancers to newsreel footage.

The mysticism which prevaded Plant's songs emanated during his stage show. "Heaven Knows" and "Ship of Fools," tracks from his current LP Now and Zen, mesmerized the audience. Plant unleashed his intensity when he belted "Other Arms" with his distinctive singing style and seemingly unlimited vocal range. Later, he showed his lighter side when he played hackey sac after performing "In the Mood" when a fan tossed a bag to him onstage.

To the roaring approval of the concertgoers, Plant devoted six of his 16 numbers to Led Zeppelin material. Led Zep classics "Going to California," "Trampled Underfoot," and "Misty Mountain Hop" have never sounded better. Plant's latest backup band triumphed in the challenge to effectively capture the spirit of Zeppelin.

The Zeppelin influence pervaded throughout the show. Plant's new band interspersed stanzas from Led Zep songs throughout the newer material. Echoes of "Heartbreaker" were heard throughout the John Lee Hooker cover tune "Dimples." The instrumental section of "In the Evening" provided the lead-in for another Led Zeppelin standard, "Nobody's Fault But Mine."

Plant's finale prior to his three encores was his new song which is fast becoming his signature tune, "Tall Cool One." Once again, this arrangement pays tribute to his days with Led Zeppelin with its aural inclusions of the band's material.

Robert Plant's appearance at the Spectrum attributes to more than the fact that he still has it; Friday's show proves that he never lost it.

Punchline

capturing the realities of comedy clubs. Some of the stand-up comics are funny, others are not. The comics all have a look of exhaustion, stemming from their seven-night-a-week work schedule and their meager earnings of $15 a night. Every detail you might find in the clubs is featured; there is a bad piano player, heckling drunks and sweating comics because of the intensity of the hot lights.

The plot centers on Hanks' Steven Gold and Field's character. She portrays Lilah, a New Jersey housewife who is obsessed with proving she is funny. At first, she is horrendously bad, having to buy other people's jokes. However, after several amusing circumstances, she is taken under Hank's wing and he instructs her on how to be funny. He does too good a job, however, and in the end Lilah is his main competitor in a battle for a network TV appearance.

The film is very effective at capturing the realities of comedy clubs.

"Punchline" succeeds as a very entertaining movies largely because of the efforts of Tom Hanks. What should have been only an average film becomes a great one through his performance. He has elevated movies to a higher level before. The most memorable of these was when he turned an awful, third-rate script into a crowd pleasing 1984 film's "Bachelor Party." But in "Punchline," he succeeds in doing this not through his natural charm, but on sheer acting ability. That ability can be summed up in one scene. Before Steven Gold goes on stage, he sees his father and older brother in the audience, and they do not know he has dropped out of medical school.

As his father and brother walk out in disgust, Hanks slowly suffers a nervous breakdown on stage. It is convincing, and real, and makes us feel sympathy for a totally unsympathetic character. This is the mark of a great actor. It is for this reason that the Motion Picture Academy might have a dilemma when they give out next year's Oscars. They will have to decide which movie Tom Hanks will win his Best Actor Oscar for: "Punchline" or "Big."

Creative decision-making.
It's the rule, not the exception, at Chubb.

The property/casualty insurance business demands an ability to make carefully calculated, creative decisions. It involves the highest sort of risk, and is the least predictable form of insurance.

Why? It has been said that people die more or less "on schedule." But who can predict when/if a bridge will collapse, an ocean liner will sink, a trusted employee will embezzle, or a home will be burglarized?

Creative thinkers make successful property/casualty insurance professionals. We should know. It's been our business for over 100 years.

Villanova Alumnus Bill Hill will be on hand November 1st for an information meeting beginning at 7 p.m. in the Connelly Center He'll be joined by Paul McDermott, Class '87. We cordially invite you to stop by and learn more about Chubb, and our innovative way of doing business. If you're a creative thinker, you will be interested to hear what we have to say.

Record Roundup. . .Eddie Money, Fishbone

Nothing to Lose
Eddie Money

For a man who has spent his entire career singing out of only one side of his face, Eddie Money's latest album, Nothing to Lose is surprisingly powerful and relatively well done. Money is a jack of all trades this time around; he sings leads and plays keyboards on all of the songs, and plays saxophone well enough to rival Clarence Clemons. The guitars are handled by Richie Zito, who has played on and co-produced Money's last two albums. The drumming is solid through all of the tracks with Mike Baird returning from a two-year exodus to back Journey on their last tour.

In the past, Money has shown a propensity for penning catchy tunes that had little, if any emotional depth to them, but along with this cast of characters, Money has succeed in producing an album somewhat different from his earlier style.

Side 1 begins with "Walk on Water," a song that blends a melodic keyboard line with Zito's powerful guitar riffs. The lyrics, however, are what make this song so strong, as Money makes a plea for true love; they show great emotion and development over earlier albums. The second song, "Magic," shares the lyrical quality of "Walk on Water," as it rolls along smoothly with a light acoustical guitar sequence.

While Money is no Bono, his music on this album has developed to the point where he merits some degree of critical attention.

While Money is no Bono, his music on this album has developed to the point where he merits some degree of critical attention. "The Love in Your Eyes," one of the better songs on the whole album, hails the arrival of Money's powerful saxophone. "Boardwalk Baby" is by far the best song of the album as the lyrics, guitars, and vocals come together to produce a balanced effort that makes one actually feel like it is summertime as the song plays.

The second side is somewhat of a letdown, as it fails to continue the positive lyrical development of the first. "Forget About Love" reverts to the older Eddie Money, as Baird's drums and Zito's guitars are allowed to exhibit all of their raw power. "Pull Together" is a song that contains a palatable blending of old and new, as the drums and sax rip away while the guitar is toned down to allow Money's developing lyrics to shine through. "Far Cry From a Heartache," while lacking deep lyrics, has a powerful, pulsating keyboard line that tends to stick in one's mind after hearing it.

If there is one place this album really comes together, it is in Money's highly underrated vocal ability. Despite the discontinuity between the two sides of the album, Money shows the ability to change the intensity and range of his voice to fit each song — he never sounds out of place no matter what kind of song he is doing.

Nothing to Lose offers great promise in that it shows Eddie Money's ability to mix his always powerful music with a message for the first time. His music has adapted to the changing times that ask for music with substance. While "Nothing to Lose" has its deficiencies, its unusually deep lyrics helps to make this an album worth a listen.

Truth and Soul
Fishbone
Columbia
½

For the last three years or so I have been telling people that "All men are mortal ... except Fishbone." Well, on their new Truth and Soul LP, these six young men from Los Angeles are actually taking themselves seriously, as well as retreading some of the old ground gone over on the In Your Face album of two years ago and the first EP, Fishbone. Fishbone has got everything you might need: ska, some harsh funk, straight rock music and even a little crooning thrown in just to show how sensitive they really are (see "Change" on the second side). This album falls short, though, in the excitement category.

Fishbone is primarily known as the most powerfully exciting live rock band on this or any planet, and their past recordings have gone a long way toward reflecting this. Truth and Soul just does not produce the goods consistently.

This band is tight and eclectic. For their Columbia debut, Fishbone has obviously smoothed out their previous open-endedness, both musically and conceptually, and they replace it with a certain degree of professionalism and social awareness. At the very least, a subdued Fishbone is better than no Fishbone at all.

Reel Life
Boy Meet Girl
RCA Records

Boy Meets Girl is a successful relationship that produced the debut album of George Merrill and Shannon Rubicam entitled Reel Life. They came together in Seattle to write two No. 1 hit songs recorded by Whitney Houston: "How Will I Know?" and "I Wanna Dance With Somebody Who Loves Me." That was only the beginning of their story.

Every song on the album perfectly reflects the name of the group with vivid images of love, happiness and real life. Titles like "Stormy Love" and "Is Anybody Out There In Love" illustrate some of the hard feelings that can happen in a relationship. But in "Bring Down The Moon" there is nothing to stop the smooth contrast of Rubicam's high-pitched voice with Merrill's mellow backup.

They continue as a perfect combination in "Waiting For a Star to Fall" where they alternate their singing and also are accompanied by alto saxophonist Andy Snitzer, who makes a fantastic solo toward the end. It all comes together to capture the moment when they fell in love.

For those who are helplessly romantic of just like to listen endlessly to love ballads, this album is filled to the brim. It has much more to do with real love than real life, but the resulting duet from this boy meeting girl turns into a very happy ending.

Julia Fordham
Julia Fordham
Virgin Records

Are you tired of the same old music? Fed up with the Top 40 fluff that invades us from the shallow, repetitive airwaves? Looking for someone with the range of, say Annie Lennox or Pat Benatar? The sensual grooves of Sade or the soul of Alison Moyet? How about the creativity of Kate Bush?

Look no further, you've found her in Julia Fordham, a blonde-haired singer-songwriter from Great Britain. Julia's self-titled debut album hits the stores this month with a successful first single and VH-1 video, "Happy Ever After," a song protesting the state of apartheid in South Africa.

The tracks flow from deep, funky numbers, such as "Unconditional Love" and "Woman of the '80's," to beautiful, stirring ballads like "Invisible War" and "Where Does The Time Go?"

Fordham has an incredibly rich voice, and uses every ounce of every octave to convey hurt, fear, love, confusion and loyalty in combinations that leave the listener breathless. She can moan lower than low, and holds the note, weaving it upwards in a dizzying spiral until it reaches a height that could only affect most canines in the area. Her melodies are smooth and sensual, with some additional vocals by Afrodiziak and Robin Clark (the honorary "fifth member" of Simple Minds).

Why not pick up a copy of Julia Fordham and introduce yourself to a brand new and legitimately talented progressive artist? Unfortunately, the only other alternative is turning on the radio and being subjected to Whitney Houston... again.

Mamet is next John Huston

By LEONARD ELLIS

"Things Change"
Directed by David Mamet

"Things Change" for Gino (Don Ameche) a poor, hard working Chicago shoeshine man when he accepts a $100 tip and a command invitation to shine a rich man's shoes. Poised to shine, Gino contacts the don Mr. Green to confess to a murder committed by a look alike, and serves the crime's jail sentence in exchange for a boat he can sail to his native Sicily. The don then assigns the wiseguy below the lowest wiseguy, Jerry (Joseph Mantegna), to shepherd and drill Gino in his confession over the weekend.

Jerry cloisters Gino in a seedy Chicago hotel room. Within minutes we sense why Jerry is on mob "probation." He does not take direction well and he is too sentimental. Jerry leads Gino to Tahoe for Jerry's idea of a fantasy weekend, where mistaken identities and brown-nosing hotel personnel slot the pair in a Galaxy Hotel penthouse suite on the Criterion Floor. There they are given complimentary clothing, room service, butler and casino cash.

Director and co-writer David Mamet proves that he may be his generation's John Huston. Like Huston, Mamet shoots stories about seamy characters. Mamet does so in a tight fashion, with hard wood or spartan sets that convey their intent without distracting the viewer, and a script that wryly caricatures men of confidence, sales and underworld pursuits. Mamet can match his screenplay for "The Untouchables" (1987), the first picture he wrote and directed "House of Games" (1987), and "Change," with Huston's "The Asphalt Jungle" (1950), "The African Queen" (1952), "Beat the Devil" (1953), "The Misfits" (1961), "Prizzi's Honor" (1985), and others with the assurance of being on the same playing field.

The late Huston started his career shooting in black and white, using unadorned light and dark cinematography. Huston handled black and white flawlessly and subtly adapted the form's eloquent lessons for his color films. Traditional theatre teaches the same with sets designed to function without diverting from the words and gestures of the actors. It is safe to say that Andrew Lloyd Webber, (Broadway's "Cats" and "Phantom of the Opera") and Ivan Reitman, (films "Ghostbusters" and "Legal Eagles") never learned these basic rules.

Mamet passes the test in "Things Change" in Mr. Green's large home, the dim $10 a night hotel, the Criterion Floor, and the Tahoe don's rustic lodge manor. The Criterion Floor is a minor shock because we expect a gaming hotel anywhere to have the Liberace furnishings of Atlantic City. Instead we are treated to Rocky mountain Park Avenue. Jerry has a wonderful imagination to conjure a casino hotel with such classic trappings.

The wry writing of Mamet costars again. In "Change," cowritten with Shel Silverstein, these choice lines are heard.
JERRY (to Gino)
"If they [other mobsters] don't want to get caught. Don't wear the ties.'
And after Jerry has trouble locating Gino after their first evening in Tahoe.
JERRY (to Gino)
"Yeah they [the indulgent hotel staff] like us real good."
"Everybody likes you when you're somebody else."

Yet, the surest sign that Mamet commands his medium is the presence of his Humphrey Bogart, Mantegna. Bogart did five films with John Huston including "The Maltese Falcon" (1939) and "Treasure of the Sierra Madre" (1948). For Huston, Bogart became the classic detective, paranoid hood, jaded war hero, career bachelor, and eccentric bon vivant. We can only hope that Mamet has similar plans for Mantegna, who has already appeared in the director's "House of Games" and the Broadway play "Speed The Plow" (1988). Cast Mantegna as a detective, newspaper editor, or the corrupt class of businessman, lobbyist or evengelist. All are easily within Mantegna's reach.

Here in "Things," Mantegna is a wiseguy so low that in a house with staff he is used to wash dishes for the kitchen help. It is Mantegna's skill in conveying Jerry's surprise, irritability, and adaptability that tell us Jerry is suited to be a fall guy in the mob.

Fused with Ameche whose pre-Tahoe Gino possesses a shoeshine man's fingers, a stooped burdened gait, and unhealthy skin, "Things" Cinderfellas are a rare couple of film buddies.

"Things Change" is a fable well worth seeing because David Mamet's script and direction refreshingly couples Joe Mantegna and Don Ameche.

Prince plays Spectrum

By NICK MAGALIO
Staff Reporter

"The sky was all purple, there were people running everywhere!" Yes, a distinct purple haze engulfed Philadelphia when rock superstar Prince invaded the Spectrum on his Lovesexy tour two weeks ago.

Prince, who is known for his wild and vivid sexual fantasies on the stage did not deviate from that reputation at the Philly show. His sexual playground included a 1960 Thunderbird, a basketball rim, a swing set, and, of course, a bed. Prince pranced around to these different sexual props at different times during the concert.

His well-choreographed eight-piece band included Sheila E. on the drums

Prince appeared at the Spectrum for the first time since his Purple Rain tour, on Oct. 18.

A dance-type atmosphere dominated Prince's concert, which included an awesome light show, lots of smoke, a "purple haze" for the hits from Purple Rain, and a hint of sensual red for his slow, "sexy" songs.

His well-choreographed eight-piece band included Sheila E. on the drums, "Cat" on backup vocals, and Patti Labelle, a hometown favorite, for a few songs.

Song highlights from the concert included two medleys. The first medley came from Prince's Lovesexy album and included "When U were Mine," "Grand Slam" and "Superfunkacalifragisexy." His second excellent medley had "When 2 R in Love," "Venus de Milo," "Strange Relationship" and finally "Rasberry Beret."

Prince also took a trip to the past to play other hits that drew great praise. These included "Kiss," "Little Red Corvette," and a roaring final of "Let's Go Crazy," "When Dove's Cry" and "1999." Prince's encore was "Alphabet St." off the Lovesexy album.

The Lovesexy tour proved to be an enjoyable dance marathon by a man who, in the true sense of the word, is a rock superstar.

Art and reason

When Mark and I decided to spend the weekend at his mother's house, I never imagined I would be walking into a mouse's nightmare. There were cats everywhere.

Cat plaques, cat statues, cat clocks, even a cat mat. I couldn't begin to duplicate her collection of kitty litter if I spent a year at a garage sale. Conspicuously absent, however, was a real cat. Strange, I thought, and began to fear that a weekend with cat woman could be a lot less than purr-fect.

But then she came home, and Mark introduced her. She was dressed surprisingly well—no leopard pants. In fact, you could say she was the cat's meow, but I'd rather not.

She offered me a cup of Dutch Chocolate Mint. Now that was something I could relate to. Then she brought it out in the most beautiful, distinctly unfeline china I'd ever seen. As we sipped, I found out that Mrs. Campbell has my same weakness for chocolate, loves the theater as much as I do, but, incredibly, never saw "Cats." So Mark and I are taking her next month.

V.U.'s waterpolo team toppled Fordham 11-9 in their home opener last week.

Water Polo soars

By WAYNE CRESSKILL
Staff Reporter

Villanova's waterpolo team continues to roll in 1988. After defeating Fordham in the Wildcats home opener last Wednesday, 'Nova managed to take two out of three in Villanova's Wildcat Tournament last weekend.

In the Fordham victory Villanova was led by Jim Riley, a senior, and Mike Klarin, a sophomore. Both netted three goals in the game. Also playing well for the Cats were goalie Steve Abbott and Farshad Charmforoosh.

Abbott, a freshman, accounted for 14 saves, while Chamforoosh, a senior, came up with two goals and five kickouts as V.U. edged Fordham, 11-9.

Villanova opened the Wildcat Invitational with a victory over Queens. Chamforoosh led the Cats once again, collecting three goals with six kickouts as the Cats wallopped Queens, 14-4.

In the following round, V.U. outscored George Washington, 12-10. Klarin led the Cats with five goals and four steals, while Charmforoosh came up with three goals.

Nova's luck ended, however, when they took on the always slick Slippery Rock team in the championship. Charmforoosh had five goals and Abbott came up with 18 saves, but it was not enough as Villanova fell, 11-7.

The Cats overall record now stands at 6-4. They travel to Navy this weekend where they will participate in the Mid-Atlantic Conference tournament.

Football

represent the Wildcats' next foe, visiting Villanova Stadium for 'Nova's homecoming game on Saturday. The Spiders are 2-4 in the conference and may be just what the doctor ordered to get the Cats back on track.

"We owe Richmond one," Talley said. "They beat us in the last 28 seconds last year and this is a conference game. We need to win it if we want to stay in the race."

On the Ball

The bowl games are a great tradition and should not be eliminated. Let's just get the two best teams together after the bowls are done and allow them to decide the title between themselves in one game. This may not be the only solution, but it would be a step in the right direction.

Women's cross country takes first in Big Five Championship

By MICHAEL E. JONES
Staff Reporter

In back-to-back weekend meets, the women's cross country team tied for first in the Big Five Championship and finished fourth in the Big East Championship.

The Big Five, held at Philadelphia's Belmont Plateau in Fairmont Park on Oct. 15, saw the Wildcats capture part of the team championship for the fourth time under Head Coach "Uncle Marty" Stern — an impressive feat considering Stern has only been at Villanova since 1983.

Sophomore Kate Fonshell led the way, finishing first for the Cats and second overall with a 16:55.6 timing over the 2.9 mile course. Sophomore Carol Haux was next, finishing fourth overall in 17:06.

"Kate and Carol did a marvelous job," noted Stern. "They've shown a great improvement over last year, and appear to be headed towards a very successful career. I'm very happy with the progress these two women have made."

Haux was followed by fellow sophomore Kim Certain, who finished 11th overall with a time of 17:26.4. Freshman Michelle Torelli was close behind, finishing 14th in 17:30.3.

Senior Meg Moisen finished fifth for the Wildcats and 16th overall in 17:48.8 to give the Cats 47 points, which tied them for first with Pennsylvania. LaSalle's Andrea Schwind was the overall winner in 16:49.2.

Other finishers for Villanova included junior Elaine Duck, placing 18th in 18:01.5; freshman Sheila Devanesan, 26th in 18:38; and sophomore Tara Kennedy, 33rd in 19:31.8.

"We're very proud and very happy to continue the success we've had over the years in the Big Five," commented Stern. "I'd like to commend our team, which is very young this year, for continuing that tradition."

The following Saturday the Cats traveled to Van Cortlandt Park in New York City for the Big East Championships. They were led by Certain, who finished the 5000-meter course in 18:09.6 to place her sixth overall.

Haux was the next Cat finisher, finishing 16th in 18:53, followed by Fonshell, who placed 19th in 19:00.1. Torelli and Moisen were right behind in times of 19:01.7 and 19:05.6, respectively to place them 20th and 21st. Their efforts gave them 82 points, good for fourth, and only six points behind third-place Boston College.

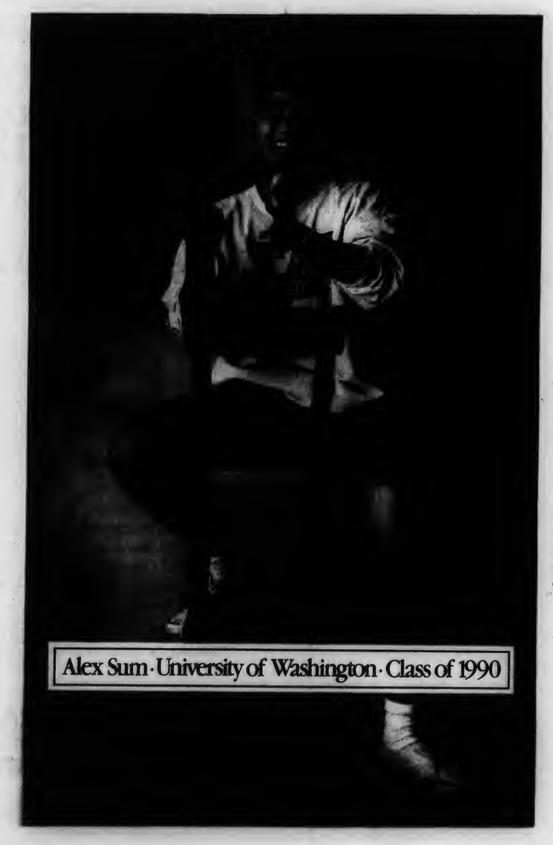
Georgetown captured the team championship with 37 points, and Providence's Tina Moloney captured individual honors, covering the course in 17:28.6.

Other Wildcat finishers included Duck, who placed 35th in 19:49 and Devansesan, who finished 60th in 21:16.4.

"Of all the Big East cross country championships we've been in, this was the most satisfying," explained Stern. "It was done without five redshirted runners, yet the women who participated were varsity runners. They are all major athletes who are a major part of our program; they carried a large responsibility in this meet and performed admirably, as is usually the case when they put on a Villanova singlet."

"I'd also like to commend Assistant Coach Mike Bellarosa, who prepared this team very well while I was in Korea," Stern continued. "He has become a very welcome addition to our program, and the runners on this team have responded well to his coaching. All seven of our runners ran their best times."

"I wasn't rubbing it in—I just wanted Eddie to know the score of last night's game."



Go ahead and gloat. You can rub it in all the way to Chicago with AT&T Long Distance Service. Besides, your best friend Eddie was the one who said your team could never win three straight.

Langran captures 500th win

By JOHN F. SWIFT
Assistant Sports Editor

The winningest coach in Villanova history has reached an incredible milestone in his illustrious coaching career. Dr. Robert Langran, coach of both the Villanova men's and women's tennis teams, received his 500th coaching victory when the women's tennis team defeated Concordia by the score of 7-2 on Oct. 9.

"It felt good to finally get the 500th win," Langran said. "I've had some great players over the years; they deserve a lot of the credit for all of the wins."

Langran, also a professor in the Villanova University political science department since 1959, is the person who can be credited with starting the successful Villanova tennis program.

He has been the coach of both the men's and women's tennis teams for 22 and 20 years respectively. Over this time he has compiled an outstanding 502-268 record which translates into a .652 winning percentage.

Dr. Langran began his quest for the establishment of a tennis program at Villanova in the late 1960s. He began his mission by starting an unofficial men's tennis team that operated between 1967 and 1969.

In 1969, the same year that the University began to admit women as full-time undergraduates, Villanova began funding both the men's and newly-founded women's tennis teams. Coach Langran's dream had become a reality, and a tradition of tennis excellence began at Villanova.

This year's women's team has had a very successful fall season. They finished with a solid 16-5 record and look to be just as successful when the spring portion of the schedule rolls around. They finished on a sour note, however, with a seventh-place finish in the Big East tournament.

One of the players that has been instrumental to the team's success is captain Laura Smelas. She was the most successful of the Wildcats in the Big East tournament, finishing third at the fourth singles slot.

"Five hundred wins is a big honor for any coach of any sport," Smelas said. She also credits Langran for helping her to become a better player. She said he just told her to "relax during matches and not press too hard."

When asked to target the key to his success, Dr. Langran said, "It's a tribute to longevity and good players. A lot of players over the years have contributed to this. I owe them a lot."

Langran's success has not been limited to the women's team. As men's tennis coach, Langran has achieved a 261-155 mark and is presently coaching his 23rd campaign.

The women's team has amassed a 239-113 record in Langran's seasons. This balance between the teams in more than just a coincidence. It just serves as evidence of his incredible coaching ability.

Rugby makes playoffs

By JOHN R. LEARY
and CARLO DiNOTA
Staff Reporters

In the past three weeks the Villanova Rugby Club clinched their playoff birth by posting victories over Haverford, U. Penn and St. Joe's, while improving their record to 5-0. The Ruggers will defend their 1987 conference title this weekend as they compete with three other teams (Bucknell, Lehigh and U. Penn) for the Eastern Pennsylvania Collegiate Championship.

In the game versus Haverford, the Ruggers found themselves trailing 12-10 at the half, despite two scores by 'Nova winger Steve Condi. Villanova regrouped, however, and were explosive for the next 40 minutes.

Scrumhalf Tom Jadico led the way with three scores in the second half, while Condi also completed his first hat trick of the season. Senior forward Dan O'Mara contributed to 'Nova's scoring surge with a five-meter try, and flyhalf Mike Koons successfully hit a dropkick from twenty-five meters out. 'Nova prevailed 37-16.

In what was perhaps their toughest match thus far, the Ruggers travelled to Philadelphia and confronted a hungry U. Penn team seeking revenge for last year's loss in the Eastern Pennsylvania finals. Center John Leary provided 'Nova with its only try of the first half, bursting off a "chopper three" for a 10-meter score. U. Penn responded with two penalty kicks to tie the game.

The second half saw senior loose forward Carlo DiNota receive a perfect pass from Brian Coughlin and run five meters for the tiebreaking points. Koons sealed Villanova's victory with a 30-meter drop-kick with only minutes remaining. 'Nova won 13-9.

In one of the biggest romps by the Ruggers to date, 'Nova soundly defeated St. Joe's 40-0 on Oct. 22 at the Morris Estates. Despite a field of thick mud and deep puddles, the 'Nova 15 played 80 minutes of relentless rugby.

Senior captain Denis Graeber, Jadico and Condi each scored two tries apiece. Lock Pete Keenan contributed to this no-contest with his first score of the year, and Koons hit his third drop-kick in three games.

The Villanova Rugby Club has outscored its opponents this season 32-36. They will play Bucknell in a semifinal match this Saturday at 3 p.m. at the Morris Estates.

Soccer offense springs to life

By JOE GUARINO
Staff Reporter

Powered by an emerging offense and the consistent goalkeeping of senior Ron Klos, the Wildcat men's soccer team compiled a record of 3-3, dating back to Oct. 4.

At the University of Pennsylvania on Oct. 4, Klos had perhaps his finest outing of the season, recording nine saves, only to lose a squeaker, 1-0. The Quakers outshot the Wildcats, 17-5, thoroughly dominating the game.

The Georgetown Hoyas came to Villanova Stadium on Oct. 8 and handed the Cats another frustrating 1-0 defeat. Although the Wildcats held an 11-9 advantage in shots on goal, they were unable to beat the Hoyas' keeper. Klos made seven saves, only to suffer the defeat.

The Wildcat offense, which has been quiet thus far this season, finally began to present itself. The Cats won three of their next four games, including a must-win game against Big East opponent St. John's.

The Spring Garden Bobcats came to town on Oct. 11 to meet the Cats. Utilizing a dominant offense, the Wildcats were victorious, 2-0.

Most of the game took place in front of the Bobcat net. Klos recorded his 13th career shutout in the victory.

Freshman Rich Maue, who missed the first six games with an ankle injury, led the offensive explosion. He scored both goals off assists by junior Peter Esz and sophomore Mike Deegan. These were the first of his young career.

The St. John's Redmen were next, in a must-win Big East matchup for the Wildcats. Another stunning performance by co-captain Klos allowed this game to move into overtime in a scoreless tie. At 4:41 of the second 10-minute overtime period, freshman sensation Maue headed Steve Grello's pass past the Redman goalie.

The 1-0 shutout was the 14th of Ron Klos' illustrious career. The win kept the Cats' hopes for a birth in the Big East tournament alive.

For his three-goal performance, Maue was named Philadelphia Soccer 7 player of the week, for the week ending Oct. 16. He leads the Wildcats with two game-winning goals and shares the lead with fellow freshman Steve Raffelini in goals this season with three.

The Villanova offense reached its peak on Oct. 19 against Swarthmore, when they were successful, 3-0. After a scoreless first half, freshman Peter Armstrong, Esz and sophomore Joe Koziol scored to post the victory.

The shutout was Klos' sixth of the season and 15th of his career. He continues to bury the seven-year-old record of 11.

At West Chester on Oct. 22, the Wildcat offense once again sputtered. Although they outshot the Rams 12-8, the Cats were unable to score a single goal. A second-half West Chester goal rewarded them with a 1-0 victory.

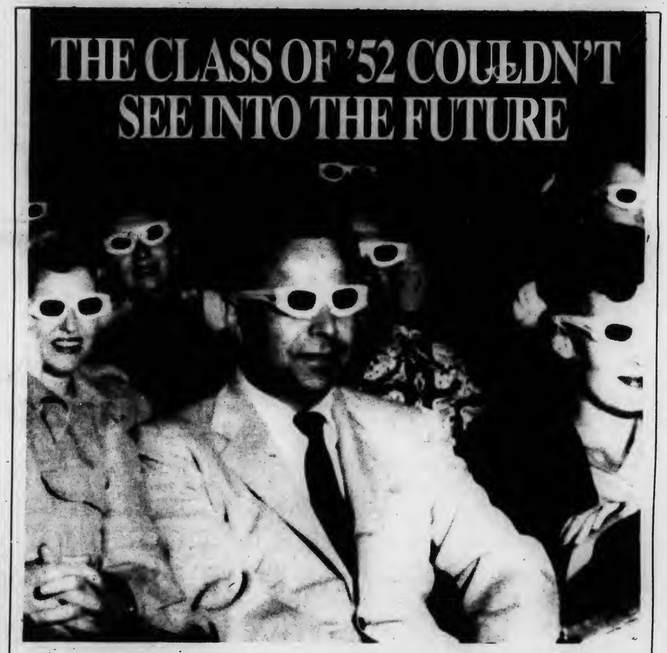
THE CLASS OF '52 COULDN'T SEE INTO THE FUTURE



Folks here are still talking about "The 1952 Incident." For some reason still unknown, a certain graduating class at a certain university missed what was certainly the opportunity of a lifetime.
The chance to meet with a recruiter from the National Security Agency.
Maybe they were busy that day. Maybe something else caught their eye. But the fact remains, a meeting with NSA could have meant a future full of challenging, exciting projects.
Now you've got the same chance. Our recruiter will be visiting campus soon in search of talented mathematicians, computer scientists, electrical engineers and linguists. And we're looking for people who want to work on important, hands-on assignments right from the start of their career.
NSA is the agency responsible for producing foreign intelligence information, safeguarding our government's communications and securing computer systems for the Department of Defense.
And we're equally committed to helping you make your future strong. So do yourself a favor and meet with us. You don't need 3-D glasses to see that it's a great opportunity.
NSA will be on campus November 3 interviewing seniors majoring in Electrical Engineering, Computer Science, Math and Language.

The Wildcats women soccer team, after a slow start, improved their overall record to 5-1-2.

Women's soccer improves

By KATHY BIELOMYZA
Staff Reporter

The red-hot Villanova women's soccer team has compiled a phenomenal 5-1-2 record since opening the season with a slow 0-4-2 start on the road against regionally and nationally-ranked teams. In their first home appearance of 1988, the Cats displayed an aggressive offensive attack spurred by a pair of early goals from junior Jeannine McLees.

Connecting for two more goals, 'Nova captured a 4-1 victory over Princeton. Head Coach Don Paxson said, "On offense we had good people, but they weren't scoring; we weren't getting the ball enough so we changed some forwards and midfielders and that's what worked."

And Coach Paxson's offense did work. The first game of the prestigious W.A.G.S. Tournament proved to be a rematch of last year's ECAC championship with the Cats battling to a 0-0 tie against Hartford at the end of regulation play.

McLees once again drew first blood, this time with just over three minutes to play in the final overtime period, giving the Wildcats a 1-0 lead. Unfortunately, Hartford rallied to even the score at 1-1 and Villanova had to settle for the tie.

Freshman goalkeeper Karen Del Sarto recorded the first shutout of her collegiate career as the Wildcats clawed their way to a 2-0 victory over Mary Washington in the second game of the tournament.

Psyched for a possible berth in the semi-final round, fought bitterly to a scoreless tie against a tough George Mason squad. However, the Patriots were able to find the back of the net twice during overtime play to capture the 2-0 decision.

The Cats relied heavily on the stellar goaltending of Del Sarto to keep the game within reach as they were outshot 26-2. When asked to comment in general on the team's defensive play this season, Coach Paxson said, "The people playing back there are all new — none have played back there this year and they're going to have lapses until they learn."

On Oct. 19 the squad faced 16th-ranked Monmouth at Villanova Stadium. Although both teams had ample opportunities to score, the game ended in a 0-0 deadlock and Del Sarto collected her third shutout of the season.

Freshman Tina Conti continued the Cats offensive explosion with a pair of goals as 'Nova then swept a 4-2 victory from St. John's on Oct. 22.

Women's tennis

By ROB T. SHERSHILACKS III
Staff Reporter

The women's tennis team finished their regular season with two victories over St. Joseph's and Drexel, but the Cat's '88 campaign ended on a down note as they finished seventh in a field of nine in the Big East tournament, held at Seton Hall.

The one bright spot in the tourney for 'Nova was captain Laura Smelas. Smelas, a senior, who hails from Metuchen, NJ. finished third at the fourth singles slot.

The senior managed to top Pittsburgh's Jill Cohen in straight sets (6-3, 6-0), and Georgetown's Marina Cheng (6-2, 6-0). But Smelas fell in her next match when she was pitted against Jerrilyn Persico of St. John's.

The Redmen star triumphed over Smelas (2-6, 6-3, 1-6). Smelas bounced back in her following match to defeat Marlene Kalinowski of Connecticut, 6-2, 6-1.

Also playing well for the Wildcats were Krista Chamberlin and Sue Bernardi. Chamberlin, a freshman, finished fourth for Villanova in the fifth singles slot, while Bernardi, sophomore, won the consolation match in the second singles slot.

Despite the fine individual efforts, the Wildcats finished seventh, collecting only 16 points. The winner of the tournament was Boston College who scored 61 points.

The seventh-place finish does not in any way dampen the women's tennis team's otherwise excellent season. 'Nova finished the '88 season with a overall slate of 16-5, their finest record since 1982 when they finished 17-3.

In addition, Head Coach Robert Langran picked up his 500th career victory. After 21 seasons in Wildcat Blue, Langran posts a remarkable 502-268 life-time record.

Volleyball kills three

By MONICA BYRNE
Staff Reporter

Last week, the women's volleyball team not only endured many grueling practices, but also hosted two of their only three home matches of the season.

On Oct. 1st the 'Cats stood at 2-10, but have since upped their record to 10-18. According to Coach Dave Barkley, his team's "greatest improvement has been mentally."

Just prior to fall break, 'Nova captured two out of three wins. The 'Cats defeated LaSalle (15-6, 15-9, 17-15), but fell to Drexel (15-6, 10-15, 8-15, 9-15) on Oct. 4th. Paced by Debbie Opitz, Sheila Duffy and Hillary Anderson, they rebounded to overcome Lehigh (15-11, 15-11, 15-9) on Oct. 11.

Three days later, the spikers traveled to Delaware for their fifth tournament of the season. Here they matched up with the University of Maryland, whom the 'Cats overpowered (15-2, 15-10, 15-11), under the leadership of senior co-captains Opitz and Karen Fraser.

Continuing its winning streak, 'Nova captured a close match against Liberty (9-15, 15-11, 4-15, 15-6, 15-9), thanks to some powerful hitting by Lisa Stephanovic. But the Wildcats then faltered by losing to Delaware (8-15, 6-15, 10-15) and New Haven (4-15, 0-15, 11-15), in their last two games of the tourney.

On Oct. 17, the North Carolina State Wolfpack visited Villanova and were given a run for their money. After three hard played games, 'Nova fell to its regionally-ranked opponent (7-15, 3-15, 10-15). The 'Cats then turned around to battle Seton Hall, for their second home game, gaining a victory in four games (15-10, 3-15, 15-12, 15-13).

In its most recent outing at the Hofstra University Tournament, Villanova played some very impressive volleyball, knocking down defending conference champ, Providence College. The 'Cats lost their opening game to the host Flying Dutchmen team (6-15, 7-15, 6-15) on Oct. 21, but awakened Saturday to beat Towson State (15-10, 15-10, 15-4).

Saturday afternoon 'Nova challenged a tough Northeastern squad, but were overpowered in three games (7-15, 10-15, 4-15), despite the efforts of Jill Beiter and Stephanovic, who recorded six kills apiece.

Giving it their all, the Wildcats then squared off against Providence in a very exciting match. 'Nova topped the Friars in four games (15-11, 12-15, 15-4, 15-9) with outstanding efforts from Fraser, Opitz, Duffy and Anderson, who recorded an impressive 51 assists, 11 digs and four block assists.

If the team can end their season real strong they will have alot of confidence going into the Big East tournament and they'll be able to play against any team.

Dave Barkley

Needless to say, Coach Barkley was very pleased with his team's performance in the Hofstra tourney, especially against Providence. He felt his players "had fun but did the job. It was nice to see that they finally trusted and depended on each other." The Cats are now beginning to gear up to face conference rival Georgetown, next week.

The Hoyas will be journeying here on Nov. 5, for a 2 p.m. game in the Jake Nevin Field House. The Cats are hoping to attract quite a few supporters to cheer them on.

Barkley believes that if his team "can end their season real strong they'll have a lot of confidence going into the Big East tournament," and feels that "they can go out and play against any team," including the best of the Big East.

V.U. field hockey ranked nationally

Sharon Seiz' goal against Rutgers at the 21:00 minute mark of the 2nd half, helped the field hockey team blank the Scarlet Knights, 2-0.

Field hockey cruised to three straight victories last week, to extend their win streak to six, a new school record, before falling to Virginia, 3-1 on Oct. 23. The Cats, now ranked 14th nationally, beat two other ranked teams on route to their record.

The Cats challenged St. Louis Oct. 14 and fought their way to a 2-1 win. Missy Paolantonio lead the Wildcat attack, scoring the first goal with 9:14 left in the first half.

The Lady Billikens tied it up before the period ended, but 'Nova sealed the win with a goal in the second minute of the second half, and strong defense during the remaining time.

'Nova notched the win despite the fact that St. Louis shut down the team's leading scorer, Sharon Seiz, who had scored in the previous five games, a new record.

The Cats then clawed their way to a 2-1 win over the 18th-ranked Duke Blue Devils. Seiz was back on top of her game, scoring both of 'Nova's goals in this match.

Despite aggressive play by Duke during the second period, the Cats hung tough and saved the victory. Goalkeeper Mary Monahan tallied 11 second-half saves.

The streak continued as 'Nova smothered 15th ranked Rutgers 2-0 on Oct. 20. Ann Dickey put the Cats ahead with 10 minutes elapsed in the first half.

Seiz scored her 22nd goal of the season in the second period, adding to the current season record for goals. The previous total was 16, set during the 1978 season.

The good fortune finally came to an end Oct. 23, when Virginia ambushed the Wildcats 3-1. Virginia, an NCAA tournament team in 1987, had been struggling this season, but mustered its forces to destroy the Cats.

Tory Rife put 'Nova in the lead with the first goal just 5:18 into the game, but the Cavaliers came back with three unanswered goals to seal the victory.

Head Coach Cheryl Massaro ascribed the team's recent successes to teamwork. "We're winning because of teamwork. It's nice to see they have the ability to trust one another and make use of each other's skills. We lose when we break away from teamwork."

Questionable call leads to tie

By JOHN G. RICCO

While most Villanovans were at home enjoying their first taste of home cooking since the summer, William and Mary (4-2-1) received some home cooking of their own en route to a 14-14 tie of Villanova (4-2-1) last Saturday.

The home cooking came in the form of a questionable call late in the game which changed an apparent go-ahead safety for Villanova to an incomplete pass.

"There's no question if you look at the film that it's a two-point safety," V.U. Head Coach Andy Talley said afterward. "It was just a horrible call and the official completely blew it."

The play came with 5:44 left in the game. The Indians had a first and 10 at their own six and were attempting to pass when V.U. middle guard Paul Franco burst into the backfield and grabbed William and Mary quarterback John Brosnahan in the end zone. Just before he hit the ground, Brosnahan flicked the ball outward.

The official closest to the play signaled for a safety and two points were awarded to the Cats, giving them a 16-14 lead. A second official, however, then came in saying Brosnahan had been attempting to pass and ruled the ball incomplete.

After a discussion between the officials, the first call was reversed and the points were taken off the scoreboard.

"I've never seen an official put two points up on the board, make the call, and then have a discussion and overrule it," Talley said.

"I gambled on the play. I used a run around technique to get into the backfield. I thought I'd sacked the quarterback," said a frustrated Franco. "They never really gave us a complete explanation."

Instead of V.U. having the ball and a two-point lead, the Indians kept possession and the game remained deadlocked.

"It (the call) took the game away from us," Talley said. "At that point there were five minutes left in the game. They would have punted to us from the 20-yard line and we could have run the clock out or scored again."

'Nova did get the ball back, but a costly fumble by fullback Pete Lombardi at the William and Mary 30 with 2:52 remaining ended the Wildcats' final drive.

Following the turnover, Brosnahan directed a nine-play, 53-yard drive to the Villanova 16. With 18 seconds remaining, 6'7" freshman Michael Possenti blocked the potential game-winning field goal attempt by Steve Christie and the game ended in a tie.

The controversial call overshadowed another fine defensive effort by the Wildcats. Over the past four contests, 'Nova has allowed an average of only 13 points per game.

"We've been playing great ever since the B.U. game," Franco said. "There is a lot of camaraderie on this team. We believe in each other which is very important for good defense."

Led by Franco, linebackers Micky Watson and Dan Falasca and defensive tackle Mike Feeley, V.U. gave a strong William and Mary offense trouble throughout the afternoon.

"Our defense played extremely well," Talley continued. "I'm very pleased with where they are right now. If we could get our offense scoring more points I think we'd be the odds-on favorite to win the conference title."

Though 14 points is not bad, it is not the result V.U. fans have come to expect from the 'Nova offense. The Cats jumped out to a 14-3 halftime lead, but failed to score in the second half.

"We were inside the 50 five times in the second half and didn't score," Talley said. "We need to go more to our passing game to get some bigger plays for us."

The first 'Nova score came on the team's initial possession of the game. Quarterback Kirk Schulz's seven-yard touchdown pass to flanker Ron Sency capped an 11-play, 63-yard drive.

A 37-yard field goal by Christie narrowed the margin to 7-3, but the Wildcats scored again on a 17-yard run by halfback Jeff Dingle for their 14-3 lead.

Dingle, the Yankee Conference's leading rusher, finished with 146 yards on 23 carries, and has 641 in 1988.

The Indians used a field goal, a touchdown and a two-point conversion, all in the third quarter to knot the score at 14.

For any sports fan, the most exciting part of the season is the playoffs. In most professional sports, a good number of teams qualify for the playoffs. With so many teams in the hunt for a title, every fan can find a team to root for even if his favorite team is eliminated.

In collegiate sports, the situation is quite similar. College basketball has the 64-team NCAA tournament and college baseball has its own College World Series. In order for a team to win a championship in either of these sports, they must overcome so many obstacles that there can be no doubt about their right to the title.

The only major sport that is without a playoff system is Division I football, which still adheres to the system of having many post-season bowl games. This leaves the national champion to be decided by the media and not by who should decide it: the players and the teams on the playing field and not in the papers.

Did anyone really believe that Brigham Young University had the best college football team in the country when they were crowned national champions a few years back? They just happened to be the only undefeated team that season so, thus, they were named national champions, although they played absolutely nobody that is worth mentioning while achieving this perfect record.

They had to come from behind to beat a mediocre Michigan team that posted a 6-5 record to claim the coveted Holiday Bowl title.

Perhaps Brigham Young could have possibly been the best team that year, but nobody will ever know because they did not have the chance to prove it. This much uncertainty and doubt just does not seem to be fair to Brigham Young, the other teams who had a legitimate claim to the title, and the fans who support all of the parties involved.

The idea of having the sports writers decide the national champion is ludicrous. If the sports writers chose the 1985 men's basketball champion and there was no tournament, would Villanova have been the champions? Of course not. Georgetown would have been the champs and Villanova would have been lucky to be in the Top 20.

Championships must be won and lost by the players and teams and not in the polls. With the collection of quality teams at the top of the polls this year, and the Pac-10 commitment to the Rose Bowl, there is an excellent chance that the two best teams will not meet on New Year's Day for the national championship. Once again, there will be some uncertainty to who the champion is and the polls of writers will make the decision.

Dobbin signals change

By KEVIN C. HEIL
Assistant News Editor

Within the first two months of the administration of the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, Villanova has undergone changes which "will translate into concrete courses of action for the University's future," as Dobbin said in his Oct. 5 inaugural address.

Analysis

Sexual harassment policy

Dobbin presented a sexual harassment policy prepared by a University committee on sexual harassment to the Board of Trustees for approval on Oct. 11. The Board approved the policy.

In a recent issue of the Villanovan, Dr. Mary Desmond, biology professor and member of the sexual harassment committee, said, "Dobbin has cut through a lot of red tape. More has happened in 20 minutes than has happened in the last five years [with the policy]."

Coed housing

Dobbin has requested a formal study on coeducational residence halls in response to a University Senate recommendation last semester.

In a memo to the Senate dated Sept. 9, he wrote, "I have requested of Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, that he conduct a study on the efficacy and feasibility of coeducational residence halls ... and that he provide me with a written report on the results of that study by December 1988."

"In principle I have no problem with [coeducational dormitories]. I myself am not a strong advocate, nor am I in any way opposed. I'd like to see the proposal as it's hammered out," Dobbin said in an interview with the Villanovan.

The Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, estimated that a final decision approving a coeducational residence hall would have to be passed by Jan. 15, 1989, in order for the Office of Residence

Casey, Gore endorse Sullivan for state senate post

By ELLIOT A. FUS
Staff Reporter

Ed Sullivan, associate director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education, continued his campaign for the state senate Tuesday at a news conference in Havertown, where he was endorsed by Gov. Robert Casey.

The next day, Sen. Albert Gore of Tennessee endorsed Sullivan at a rally held in Connelly Center.

Sullivan is running for the 17th district senate seat against longtime Republican incumbent Sen. Richard A. Tilghman.

The conference at Havertown's Lynnewood Elementary School enabled Sullivan to illustrate his views through Casey's endorsement. Sullivan primarily discussed environmental issues.

"We live in a time of increasing awareness of environmental concerns; air pollution, water pollution, trash, toxic waste, acid rain. The people of the 17th district ... are anxious for the political official to take strong action," said Sullivan.

Specifically, he proposed to invigorate the State Superfund Bill enacted by Casey, which would clean up toxic pollution at federal sites. He emphasized a Havertown site containing PCP and dioxin pollution that had been ignored for 20 years.

During this campaign Sullivan has returned to what he has called

Wilke hearing held

"I can't conceive not teaching at Villanova. It's what I am," said Raymond G. Wilke, communication arts professor, during a public hearing held Oct. 28-29 to determine if substantive grounds exist for his dismissal from the University.

The University charged Wilke on three accounts: first, negligence in teacher instruction, unresponsiveness to student questions and treatment of students in an abrupt and abusive manner; second, regarding students without respect and using disparaging ethnic and racial remarks in class; and, third, engaging in sexual harassment, according to Raymond T. Cullen, the attorney for the University's case.

The judicial committee that presided over the case was comprised of Dr. G. Lee Christensen, civil engineering professor; Dr. Mary Desmond, biology professor; and Dr. Edward J. Mathis, economics professor. The committee

Eating disorders: two silent killers

By JACQUELINE GENTILE
Assistant Features Editor

"I knew I was exercising a lot, but I didn't think it was anything I couldn't handle ... I could eat if I wanted to, but I just didn't want to." These words were spoken by a former patient at the North Jersey Center for Eating Disorders, part of the St. Clares-Riverside Medical Center, located in Boonton, N.J.

According to Patricia Giaquinto, a registered nurse on the staff of the North Jersey Center for Eating Disorders, it has been only in about the past 10 years that there has been a strong awareness of eating disorders. And the stories of the stars who have suffered from eating disorders, Jane Fonda, Karen Carpenter and Susan Dey, "help people that are not aware ... to understand the plight of someone who has an eating disorder."

Anorexia nervosa is an eating disorder in which victims refuse to eat. Giaquinto explained that people who were 25 percent below their ideal body weight used to be diagnosed as anorexic, but now it is 15 percent, so the problem can be caught before it worsens. Anorexia nervosa victims are also diagnosed as having a phobia of becoming fat and a disturbance in the way they perceive their bodies.

Giaquinto stated, "They are convinced they are fat, when in reality they are very emaciated looking." In females, victims have also missed three consecutive

Senate discusses tuition

By DANIEL MORIARTY
Staff Reporter

(Photo by Castano)

Dr. Wilber W. Baker, faculty senator and biology professor, said he had "a great deal of trouble taking the Senate seriously."

The University Senate last Friday approved a motion that "the planning and priorities and budget committees shall endeavor to maintain tuition for the 1989-90 school year at the [current] tuition levels."

The motion by Law School Senator Michael Curtis originally contained the sentence, "In no case shall any college's tuition increase more than 5 percent."

However, by majority vote, the 5 percent increase cap was removed from the motion.

Dr. Alvin A. Clay, dean of the College of Commerce and Finance and chairman of the Senate budget committee, said the 5 percent tuition increase cap would be "more appropriate" after the budget committee report is released in February or March.

Such a cap "might not be possible," added Dr. Vito L. Punzi, chemical engineering professor and student life committee member.

In an attempt to keep the original motion intact, Student Senator Jonathan Zahm proposed amending it by adding that a two-thirds majority in the Senate could overrule the 5 percent tuition cap if necessary.

Zahm's proposed amendment to the motion was rejected.

Student Government President John Lewis also proposed in his report a 5 percent increase for each school within the University and a 4 percent increase in room and board.

Lewis' report stated, "Tuition increases should only occur when costs increase... Most economists have projected inflation rates [for 1989] between 4.4 and 5.1 percent.

The report suggests that room and board prices reflect the consumer price index, which "is currently at a 4 percent annual rate."

Lewis also said that the 1988-89 projected surplus of $2 million be applied to the 1989-90 operating budget to reduce a tuition increase.

Punzi said that the tuition report was compiled solely by students and not by the student life committee, which is composed of both students and faculty.

Lewis also submitted a list of comparable schools to determine whether or not Villanova's faculty increment and tuition increase is in line with other schools.

The list, which consisted of 16 East Coast private schools, showed Villanova to be the sixth most expensive in terms of average tuition paid per student.

Dr. Harry R. Strack, political science professor and faculty senator, asked about the exclusion of state schools from Lewis' list.

Dr. Philip A. Maurone, physics professor and Senate chairman, pointed out that such lists ought to distinguish between those schools with whom Villanova "competes successfully" and those with whom it does not compete successfully.

The Senate also voted to grant Senate seats to students Zahm and Christopher Sperduto.

Zahm and Sperduto, both transfer students, were elected last spring despite their credit status as sophomores. The Senate constitution prohibits sophomores from being senators.

Dr. Wilber W. Baker, biology professor and faculty council chairman, objected to the exception for Sperduto and Zahm.

"I think it is a dangerous precedent ... there is no reason you couldn't get the Constitution changed ... let's go through the proper procedure," Baker said.

In his initial remarks Baker also said, "I have a great deal of trouble taking the Senate seriously. I think the majority of the faculty take it even less seriously."

After the meeting, Baker complained that the Senate has become primarily a forum for budgetary matters.

Baker said, "There's a lot of business that should be addressed but isn't. [For instance,] I don't see academics being addressed at a University-wide level."

After the meeting, Lewis defended the Senate, saying, "The Senate addresses all pertinent issues ... where the University spends its money is where its priorities are."

Off-campus housing woeful

By CHRISTINE E. ATKINS
Staff Reporter

Once again, off-campus University students have been forced to deal with housing codes in surrounding townships.

Part of the problem stems from enforcement of zoning laws in Radnor and Lower Merion townships, which state that no more than two or three unrelated people may live in the same house, respectively.

The Rev. Francis Farsaci, advisor for off-campus residents, said "To live in Bryn Mawr, students will pay on the average between $150 to $250 per month." He also cited that total monthly rent for local houses often exceeds $1,000.

In addition to many upperclassmen, Farsaci guessed that between "300 to 400 freshmen are living off-campus, either at home or in apartments."

The following description of police enforcement tactics is an excerpt from a letter which appeared in the Sept. 30 issue of the Villanovan:

"After mumbling several words and claiming a search warrant, one of the policemen, about 6'3" and 230 lbs., proceeded to kick in the door, jamming the girl's arm between the wall and door..."

According to Farsaci, when the University contacted the police department, police said they were "not aware of any illegality in the incident."

One student resident of Lower Merion Township complained that the zoning officials' techniques "have been nothing short of unethical." She explained, "The officials have been soliciting complaints from our neighbors... every morning this week an official came to check how many cars we had parked out front ... He also asked our neighbors what we were like."

Another student living on a heavily populated street in Bryn Mawr reported that the zoning officials "asked residents to take pictures of student cars and the students who drive the cars."

Robert Duncan, director of the Lower Merion Township zoning department, reported that the officials "absolutely do not solicit complaints from neighbors," and said that the township merely responds to complaints and petitions it receives about student residents.

He said that the neighbors "ask me how they can help reduce the number of student houses," and said, "if the residents do take pictures, the township can later use these as evidence."

Duncan suggested students living off-campus "show respect for neighbors" in order to develop good relationships.

Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, explained that the University is "most eager to help off-campus residents to deal with problems" arising out of recent zoning enforcement.

Coed dorm study continues

By KRISTEN FALLAN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, is preparing a report on the coeducational dormitory issue, to be submitted to the University Senate by the end of this semester.

The charge was given by the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, in response to a Senate recommendation last semester.

Neville said he will be referring to "the Student Government report, the experience of the resident staff and other schools' experiences with this type of experience" when preparing what he calls the "alternate floor housing" report.

While tradition and Catholic school expectations are being considered, Neville said he is also considering the structural advantages and disadvantages. For example, Neville said "because vandalism is greater in men's dorms, mixed dorms would probably decrease vandalism."

According to Neville, the root of one of the disadvantages is in building structure. He said, "We have old facilities ... how do you adjust?"

While discussing the disadvantages of the building design, Neville explained that the "overriding concern is security." This was due to the fact that although visitation would still exist, stairwells would be common ground and it would be difficult to tell who belongs in the building and who does not, after visitation hours.

With this security issue in mind, Neville suggested that, were there to be alternate floor housing, "the best place would be Good Counsel [Hall] because of its central entrance and divided floors."

If Dobbin should decide to approve an alternate floor housing plan, Neville said, "We will probably start with one unit ... operate it on a first-come, first-serve basis ... and then study that."

Neville also said, "I hope the decision that is arrived at happens early in the semester ... this way we would know where the change would be ... and people would have a choice [of housing]" for the fall 1989 semester.

Bush, Dukakis on foreign policy

By DANTE J. SCALA
News Editor

Vice President George Bush and Gov. Michael Dukakis have different visions of the United States' role in international affairs.

As he has with several domestic issues, Bush has embraced the Reagan doctrine on foreign policy. The doctrine includes " a peace through strength' military policy" and "the need for continued U.S. leadership, even dominance, where American interests are at stake," said political reporter John J. Farmer in a recent issue of the Newark Star-Ledger.

Dukakis' past statements, in contrast, "suggest a greater reluctance than Bush to use U.S. military might, especially alone, and a larger regard for the weight of world opinion and the usefulness of internationl institutions," according to Farmer.

Nonetheless, Dukakis has complimented President Ronald Reagan for his success in signing a treaty with the Soviet Union to take out medium-range missiles from Europe — "a backhanded concession that Reagan's tough military build-up policies worked," said Farmer.

Dukakis has also said he wants to modernize U.S. conventional forces.

The differences between the two candidates' views on foreign policy are highlighted in a number of specific issues:

Central America

Bush has said he wants to continue aid to the Nicaraguan contras, who are fighting against the leftist Sandinista government.

Dukakis wants to shut down all aid to the contras. "What we're doing in Central America," Dukakis has said, "is a violation of U.S. and international law." His position seems to be approved by Latin American leaders, said Farmer.

Weapons

"Bush has endorsed virtually every weapon proposed for the American triad, its air-, sea- and land-based nuclear arsenal," including the "Star Wars" missile defense system, said Farmer.

In the past, Dukakis has spoken out against the MX and Midgetman missiles, as well as the B1 bomber. He also would cut "Star Wars" funds significantly.

But he has also said that the land-based part of the nuclear triad probably needs to be modernized.

For his part, Bush has spoken of concerns with the "Star Wars" system's cost and feasibility. He recently said that budget restrictions preclude the deployment of both the MX and Midgetman missiles. One would have to be chosen.

Soviet Union

Both candidates are expected to try to get the Soviet Union to sign a treaty reducing long-range strategic nuclear weapons. They also want to reduce large Soviet tank armies in Central Europe, according to Farmer.

Dealing with other countries

"More than Bush, Dukakis seems committed to closer consultation with allies in Europe and national leaders in Central and South America on questions in these regions, even when U.S. interests are heavily at stake," according to Farmer.

Dukakis also appears to value the United Nations more highly than Bush does, said Farmer.

Human rights

"In general, Dukakis has suggested he would give higher priority to human rights than would Bush, imposing human rights conditions on all military and economic aid," said Farmer.

South Africa

Bush supports Reagan's current policy of "constructive engagement" in the apartheid state of South Africa. This policy includes U.S. investment and "no expansion of the current limited embargo," said Farmer.

Dukakis wants to completely divest from South Africa. He has described the nation as a "terrorist state."

Professors debate economic issues

By MICHAEL BELLOPEDE
Staff Reporter

On Oct. 27, Omicron Delta Epsilon and the Economics Society co-sponsored a Villanova faculty forum on the national economic issues relevant to the upcoming election.

The Republican views were represented by Dr. James J. Clarke, professor of finance and marketing, and Dr. Peter Zaleski, professor of economics.

Their colleagues, representing the Democrat views, were economics professors C.G. Walsh and Dr. Martin Asher.

Asher began the forum by asking the audience if it really is better off than it was before the Reagan administration. He discussed the fiscal state of affairs currently facing the country. He said the $150 billion budget deficit is three times what the Carter administration had experienced. Foreigners are carrying the United States debt, and the debt-to-gross national product (GNP) ratio is much higher than ever experienced during the Democrat years, he said.

Asher added that the worst recession the country had experienced since the Great Depression was during the first term of President Ronald Reagan and Vice President George Bush.

He also explained that Bush's "1,000 points of light" refers strictly to aid by volunteer, non-governmental associations.

Walsh reminded the audience of the $150 billion deficit of the current administration.

He also said the real recipients of the tax cuts were the top 10 percent income earners and that 80 percent of the total population had a real income decline.

Walsh pointed out that during the 1970s, 1 percent of Americans received 9 percent of the total income. During the Reagan years, the top 1 percent gained 12.5 percent of the total income, and 80 percent of the total population experienced an income decline.

Zaleski reminded the audience that the national debt had actually dropped from 22 percent of the GNP in 1977 to 15 percent in 1988. He said he also believes that Bush's "flexible freeze" budget plan will reflect a cut in defense spending.

However, if Dukakis were to be elected, the country would experience large increases in social programs, along with significant tax increases to underwrite these programs, he said.

To further support the Republican issue, Clarke described Reaganomics as not supply-side economics, but rather as neo-classic economics. Neo-classic economics is an economics of free markets. Although not prevalent during the 1960s and 1970s, free-market economics returned with the Reagan years.

Clarke also discussed the economics of risk and reward. Bush proposes, if elected, to do away with the capital gains tax.

Clarke added that the only way to cut the budget deficits was by giving the President line-item veto power.

Writer Viorst lectures

By BARBARA KRESCH
Staff Reporter

Milton Viorst, journalist and chronicler of the "turbulent" 1960s, lectured at the University on Oct. 27 as part of the "1960s: Politics and Culture" Honors program seminar.

He introduced the lecture with the question, "What does the '60s mean?" He described it as a "unique period marked by internal turmoil" and compared it to a revolution.

In the 1960s, as in any revolution, "the world goes on, but the institutions become out of sync," he said. The ideology of the time strove for equality, but the society did not conform.

"The revolution was never in the right place," he said. It was scattered throughout the country, mostly on college campuses, and never came together where the government was.

Viorst separated the 1960s into two phases with two opposing views of freedom. The first was characterized by the civil rights movement and emphasized the unified struggle to create equal freedom for all people.

Phrases like "community" and "obligation to the whole," which were found in the early 1960s, were replaced by emphasis on the "individual" and "doing your own thing" in the latter part of the 1960s," he said.

Viorst quoted a song lyric from the latter period, "ain't nobody's business but my own," as an example of the negative freedom.

The idea of the liberation of the individual founded the sexual and drug revolutions and the struggle of people to free themselves of social constraints, family obligations and career tracks that smothered the individual. Social and moral responsibility became absent in the society in the second phase of the 1960s, he explained.

Viorst said he sees the United States today as the result of what happened in the 1960s. The "right," including President Ronald Reagan and his followers, seized upon the previous ideas of the "left." Business and social classes are free to act without government constraint and the "me generation" thrives.

"As a result of the '60s, the notion of hard work and innovation are lost," and there is a lack of social responsibility, Viorst said. He said that this can be seen in both the Democratic and Republican parties. Viorst gave examples such as the lack of concern about the environment and nuclear waste.

"We have gone beyond freedom into disintegration," he said.

In conclusion, Viorst urged the audience to remember what the 1960s was trying to communicate and to be conscious of its effects in a contemporary society.

In the 1960s Viorst worked as a journalist for the New York Post and the Washington Star and wrote numerous articles for other national newspapers. He wrote several historical books on various subjects, including "Fire in the Streets," published in 1980, which the students from the class read.

He recently finished a book on the Middle East and is now writing articles for the New Yorker and National News Report.

SASS plans demonstration to protest Playboy edition

By DANTE J. SCALA
News Editor

Students Against Sexual Stereotypes (SASS) will demonstrate against Playboy magazine's plans for a "Women of the Big East" pictorial Monday at 3:30 p.m. outside the St. David's Inn, said SASS member Tracey Burke, Tuesday.

The organization also plans to demonstrate against a University-sanctioned calendar featuring Villanova women "before Thanksgiving, hopefully," said Burke.

The inn will be the scene of interviews between the magazine's representatives and potential candidates for the pictorial. Burke said the representatives will be at the inn today and Monday, according to a magazine employee which SASS contacted Tuesday.

Burke said the group will demonstrate Monday in order to bring the issue to people's attention and to provoke thoughts on the subject.

There will be no attempt to deny people their civil rights, said Burke. She added that SASS was against any disciplinary actions the University might take against students who pose for the magazine.

Burke said the magazine would get enough models, whether the demonstration is held or not.

SASS will protest both the pictorial, which will feature nude and semi-nude photographs, and the University calendar featuring clothed women because it sees a connection between the two, said Burke.

In both, there is an element of focusing solely on a person's appearance and neglecting other aspects of the person, said Burke.

For instance, Burke said a person's body is the only thing that matters in a magazine like Playboy, which exploits women.

"What a person dreams about, what their goals are, what their sense of humor is like, all of those elements get lost, and we [members of SASS] resist that kind of dehumanization," she said.

Burke also said the magazine sets up standards for what a beautiful person ought to look like, standards "that most people can't attain and ought not feel obligated to try to attain."

Burke said that while the calendar has been described as "tastefully done," SASS has not come to a consensus on whether it is better or worse than the pictorial.

"In a way, the calendar is more dangerous, because it's more subtle," said Burke.

Yale cheerleaders cry "foul"

Although Naval Academy officials dismiss midshipmen's long tradition of passing cheerleaders from opposing teams through the stands as harmless fun, Yale cheerleaders call it sexual assault and have filed a complaint with the academy that cited the conduct of midshipmen at an Oct. 1 football game.

The incident left the cheerleaders so upset that they were unable to perform well during the rest of the game, said Anna Chavez, captain of the Yale cheerleading squad.

The cheerleaders said they want an apology from the midshipmen, along with a guarantee it will not happen again.

But when Army played Yale the following weekend, the cadets asked to pass some of the Yale cheerleaders through the stands, Chavez said. "My girls couldn't believe it," she said, adding the answer was a firm "no."

Campus housing shortages easing

The on-campus housing shortage that plagued students at scores of campuses earlier in the fall seems to be easing, housing officials report.

While at some campuses students have learned they will stay in "temporary" quarters at nearby hotels or in study lounges through the end of this term, dorm officials at the universities of Miami and Washington and at George Mason University in Virginia, for instance, said last week they had found on-campus rooms for almost all the students who wanted them.

Soccer match to ease town rifts

Against a backdrop of strained town and gown relations at campuses around the country, one student in New York is hoping to let students and townsfolk kick each other around on a soccer field instead.

State University of New York at Oneonta (SUNY-Oneonta) graduate student Ken Mahoney is trying to stage the world's biggest soccer game on the campus Nov. 12 "so people can meet each other in a good way for a change."

He hopes to have 1,000 people participate, and then submit proof of the contest to the Guinness Book of World Records.

"It'll be the same set-up as a normal soccer game," he explained, except "there'll be one goalie, 150 fullbacks, 200 halfbacks, 200 fullbacks and 149 or so strikers on each team."

He got the idea, he said, because Oneonta is also home to the National Soccer Hall of Fame.

SUNY-Oneonta President Alan Donovan will be one goalie, and Oneonta Mayor David Brenner will tend goal for the other team.

Women's task force formed

By SINEAD QUINN
Staff Reporter

The Women's Issues Task Force has been established as a part of the Office of Social Action Programs. The task force was recommended by the Program Evaluation Committee (PEC) last spring.

The PEC report recommended that the University create a committee dedicated to insuring the rights and looking after the needs of women as a minority. The PEC report was intended in part to prepare the University for the Middle States evaluation in 1990.

The Office of Social Action Programs is in charge of such programs as academic advancement, Project Sunshine and affirmative action. Consequently, the Women's Issues Task Force came under the auspices of Social Action as well.

The task force is headed by Dr. Diane P. McCauley, who is faced with setting the goals and boundaries of the newly-established task force. McCauley said that the task force is still in organizational stages. Goals must be reasonable and achievable, she said.

"Right now, our goal is simply to educate" the University "about the issues pertaining to women,"

Voters to be transported

By PATRICK MOUSSEAU
Staff Reporter

Villanova students will have transportation to the election polling booths on Tuesday, according to Arline Kerrigan, secretary of external affairs in Student Government.

Buses will leave from Bartley Circle between 8 a.m. and 8 p.m., approximately every 30 minutes. The buses will take the students to Radnor High School and Radnor House, the polling places for main and south campuses, respectively.

Transportation will not be provided to the Agnes Irwin School, where residents of Moriarty Hall will vote, Kerrigan said.

Approximately 800 students have registered to vote. "We are hoping for at least 750 students to be registered by the county," said Kerrigan. If a voter registration card is messy or incomplete, it can be rejected, she explained. One card has been returned by the county to be re-done, which is a very positive sign, she added.

State elections can be close races, said John Lewis, Student Government president. As a result, Lewis said there is a slight fear in local politics that a block of voters may influence the race. "If we bus in 500 voters, we can make a difference," he said. The voter regulations may be tightened for students, he added.

Student Government will "ensure that students have access to the electoral process and that their constitutional rights are upheld," said Lewis.

Sullivan campaign continues

"old style" politics. It consists of meeting one-on-one with people, both in their homes and in busy public places.

People respond well to this approach, according to Sullivan, who said he feels that although people want to be close to government, they often feel alienated from it.

"This [campaign] is not just about a person," said Sullivan "this is about some important issues."

Sullivan has based his campaign on three main issues. These are environmental protection, consumer rights and the concept of basic political services.

He has said he believes that government is an extension of the people. He also said that an elected official must be in constant contact with the citizens of his district, whether through public meetings, news letters or office hours.

Mary Pat Bonner, Sullivan's head of fundraising, organized Gore's visit. Bonner coordinated his presidential campaign in Pennsylvania. Sullivan said that Gore's alignment as a fellow progressive Democrat would create positive publicity.

The Gore rally, sponsored by the Villanova College Democrats, was held at 11:15 a.m. in the Connelly Center's main lounge. "I have singled out Ed Sullivan because I truly think he is an outstanding candidate," said Gore. "Ed Sullivan represents the way of the future."

Gore went on to address Sullivan's potential value as an advocate for the University community. "One of the secrets to success in politics is to have strong support in your base," said Gore.

Gore stressed the importance of a young, progressive candidate in order to balance the exploding pace of population and technology. "Our strategy for coping with this tremendous period of change must be a greater emphasis on education," he said.

He spoke of Sullivan's affiliation with the University as well as his support for a proposal providing 22,000 college grants for high school students.

Sullivan continued the rally by appealing to the crowd as a pro-education underdog. "Be a part of this upset," said Sullivan, comparing his race to the 1985 Villanova upset of Georgetown in the NCAA basketball tournament championship game.

College Democrats flounder as election draws near

By College Press Service

Just weeks before the presidential election, anyone who wanted to still could not find Yale University's chapter of the College Democrats.

"They haven't re-registered yet," reported Betsy Schiller, who answers the phone at the dean of students' office.

While College Republicans (CR's) nationwide prepare to harvest the fruit of "leadership seminars" and organize manuals with dormitory room-by-dormitory room dragnets for Republican voters at some colleges on Nov. 8, campus Democratic groups around the country seem to be struggling to get organized or, as in Yale's case, to be seen.

"College Dems," says Catherine Crane of the National Student Campaign for Voter Registration, "are less organized than they should be during an important presidential year. I don't know why."

Crane, trying to enlist the group in a registration effort, eventually found the group's national president "by accident."

"I admit there appears to be total chaos and a lack of stability," conceded Dr. William Bertschy, faculty advisor to the Young Democrats at Colorado State University.

Many chapters, of course, have been productive and active. At the State University of New York (SUNY) — Albany, for example, the College Democrats have "had a voter registration drive and speakers like Lisa Dukakis," reported group co-founder Karen Balter.

At Portland State University in Oregon, Democratic Club President Lee Shiassler excitedly recounted how he had arranged a Jesse Jackson visit to campus in less than 12 hours, and noted his group had also helped register voters.

Asked how many students belonged to his chapter, however, Shiassler said, "about two."

Yet organizers at Agnes Scott College in Georgia, Colorado State and Indiana University claimed they were pleased by the numbers of students who joined in September.

But other groups at Jacksonville State University in Florida, the University of Idaho and the University of Houston still were trying to scrape together initial organizational meetings in late September and early October. With little guidance in recruiting members, Oregon State's Democrats managed to draw 12 people to an Oct. 4 organizational meeting with state Chairman Harry Demarest.

"I'm anxious to help," one unnamed student told the Daily Reveille, Louisiana State University's student paper, "but I can't find a [campus party] number to call."

She's not alone. Democratic National Committee (DNC) headquarters in Washington, D.C., was unable to get the phone numbers of or even name the College Democrats of America's executive director or national president.

"They changed receptionists," explained Jonathan Miller, the Harvard senior who is, in fact, the group's executive director.

Miller agreed college Democrats are not very visible, but argued it was because most of the 650 chapters go under the "Students for Dukakis" name.

By contrast, College Republicans Executive Director Susan Brackin said the CRs has "about 1,000" campus chapters, to which it regularly feeds campaign literature — "we exposed Dukakis's furlough program and that he's soft on crime" — organizing manuals, lobbying updates and training seminars.

The College Democrats, Hale noted helpfully, has "a nationwide newsletter."

It also has a lot less money. Both Hale and Miller are full-time students working without pay, as opposed to Brackin and the CRs' president, who both get stipends. While students can reach the College Republicans through an 800 number, the campus Democrats do not have a Washington office of their own.

Many student Democrats, moreover, don't bother to call. Karen Balter of SUNY-Albany's Democrats didn't join the College Democrats of America because "there is a registration fee, and we have a budget of $0."

"The Republicans have more funds," Crane said. "This has an impact on their ability to organize efficiently. The money is part of the issue."

"We're behind the Republicans in fundraising," Miller said.

One reason the party is so weak on campuses is that Democrats as a breed generally resist being organized, political scientists say.

"The Democratic party," said Marquette University Professor John McAdams, "is a coalition formed by people who agree on just enough to go to the polls and vote Democratic."

Republicans are "more homogenous," he added. They "agree on more and could organize more

Dobbin's term signals change

Life to implement the arrangement for fall 1989.

Divestment

In response to student concerns, Dobbin said that Edward J. Caughlin III, chairman of the investment committee of the Board of Trustees, assured him in early October that the University has completely divested from South Africa.

The decision to divest was made at the April 14, 1987 meeting of the board, when the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., was University president.

"There are moral arguments on both sides [as to] whether divestiture is the best strategy to accomplish social justice in South Africa. The University had to opt for one side or the other. Obviously, the University opted to divest," Dobbin said in the Oct. 7 issue of the Villanovan.

"We never invested in South Africa as a principle," he explained. "We had no knowledge that we were in South Africa. We were simply investing, like most other universities, in the various companies."

He added that the University's divestment was a moral statement, but that he would not condemn others who refused to make that statement.

Unified graduation

Dobbin has also decided that the graduation ceremony for the Class of 1989 will be unified.

Plans under consideration

In his inaugural address, Dobbin referred to further initiatives which are under consideration.

Among these is additional on-campus housing for at least 1,400 students. Dobbin said approximately 94 percent of the University's applicants seek resident status, which is available for 50 percent of undergraduate students.

"This forces literally thousands of our students to find off-campus housing with the ensuing stress placed both upon the quality of student life and upon the relationship of the University with its neighbors," he explained.

He also said the University is in the process of establishing task forces to study recommendations concerning the quality of life at Villanova. One committee will study ways of heightening the intellectual and cultural atmosphere on campus, while another committee, reporting to Dobbin, will study "the Catholic character and ambience of life at the University," Dobbin said.

He also spoke of additions and renovations to University facilities. These would include new office space for faculty and administration, a modern health care facility, state-of-the-art science and engineering laboratories and seminar space "to provide the integrated quality of learning which we plan to provide," he said.

He added that the University desperately needs to increase its endowment. Consequently, the largest fundraising drive in the University's history is being planned.

"Using income generated by endowment is the most sensible way for the University to provide financial aid to students of low and middle income families, who increasingly are finding Villanova too expensive to attend," he explained.

"We are deeply committed to control costs even as we seek greater excellence. We realize that raising tuition to provide financial aid to the less fortunate is an inefficent way of keeping Villanova open to students of varied economic background. Income generated by endowment raised for that purpose would be a preferable and fairer alternative," he added.

"The growth for which we shall plan is a growth to quality; quality of life on campus and quality in all programs," he said.

$2 million needed for maintenance

By DIANE A. CILIONE
Staff Reporter

The University should spend an additional $2 million on current and deferred maintenance on campus, according to John Gallen, the new executive director for facilities management.

The $2 million increase, in addition to the approximately $1.5 million presently alloted per year to maintenance, is a figure based on 2 percent of estimated campus value, said Gallen. He added that the $3.5 million is enough to maintain the facilities the University currently has.

"Over the last couple of years the maintenance budget has crept up only with inflation," said Gallen. Meanwhile, the University is growing in faculty, program quality and physical facilities. Maintenance also needs to grow with the University, Gallen added.

The problem of deferred maintenance on college campuses is prevalent across the nation, according to an article in the Oct. 18 issue of the New York Times.

The article, based on a report titled "The Decaying American Campus: A Ticking Time Bomb," stated that the total potential need for campus maintenance could cost up to $70 billion across the country. The report was based on 217 responses of randomly surveyed colleges.

"The survey found that despite urgent repair needs, colleges and universities deferred $4 for every $1 spent on maintenance in their 1988 budgets," according to the article.

"The study found that, while the number of square feet of campus facility space had increased by more than 50 percent since 1970, the share of college and University budgets given to their physical plants had remained almost constant," the article stated.

Classrooms, laboratories, libraries and office building were cited by the schools surveyed as the facilities in greatest need of repairs. Students were affected 'in a multitude of ways by the deficiencies," stated the article.

The article reported that tuition increases are not the complete solution to the deferred maintenance problem. Universities must try to obtain federal, state, and private funds to finance the maintenance. However, government funding programs are more favorable toward new construction rather than renovation projects, the article stated.

There are substantial current and deferred maintenance projects which should be addressed at Villanova, Gallen said. "Anything having to do with public safety is always an immediate priority. I really think that the problems that are the most hazardous we attack right away," he added.

Gallen said the electrical systems of the University need to be upgraded. The computer systems at the University need at constant flow of electricity. The University is presently trying to install a loop-system of electricity which allows the system to get power from two directions, according to Gallen.

Gallen said roofs on campus buildings are also a high priority. A roof cannot be expected to last in good condition for more than 20 years. Maintaining the roofs on the buildings prevents water damage, said Gallen.

Updating and maintaining utility systems is another priority for maintenance, Gallen said.

Environment maintenance is a constant job. Grounds care, dormitory and classroom painting, and janitorial services are all important elements of maintenance, he said.

In the past two years the University has spent much money on fire safety, he added. Asbestos removal in some of the buildings is also a maintenance project which needs money.

The University has made improvements in supplying ramps and facilities for handicapped people, projects that continue to be priorities for maintenance, he added.

Gallen said the University received some federal funds for an environmental project a few years ago. "We can usually only get federal money for safety, environment, or energy projects. We will try to tap appropriate federal programs in the future," he said.

The Board of Trustees established the position of executive director of facilities management last December in response to a study of University facilities.

The purpose of the job is "to roll together maintenance and construction and improvement projects and to develop a budget for that," said Gallen. "We need to catch up on maintenance," he added.

Gallen has worked for 27 years in the U.S. Navy Civil Engineer Corps. He is a member of the Association of Physical Plant Administrators and he has been in his position for five weeks.

Student Government plans year's academic agenda

By PEARSE A. McDADE
Staff Reporter

The department of academic affairs of the Student Government plans to "revamp goals and take a look at ways to improve academic standards," said Laura Stevens, secretary to the department.

Currently, the department is in the process of identifying the major goal for the department.

Stevens suggested academic advisement and grade inflation as possible topics.

The members of the committee are Secretary Laura Stevens, Assistant Secretary Barbara Kresch, Sylvia Altwardt, Sean Noble, Lauri Sawdi, Tim Slavin and Jeri Smith.

"[The committee's purpose is] really two-fold. We represent student interests and we try to maintain and raise academic standards," Stevens said.

She noted that members share "an interest in academic life" and are drawn from a group consisting of last year's members, members of other committees, and participants in a recruitment meeting held earlier this semester.

According to Stevens, one of the ideas the committee is considering is a proposal to place course syllabi in a central location in Falvey Memorial Library, where they can be examined by students as they prepare for registration.

In addition to the syllabi, the plan would make department subcatalogues available for student scrutiny.

Stevens also mentioned a proposal to extend the "withdraw without penalty period" for students with course overloads and said that this extension might eventually be offered to all students.

Stevens said the methods of the committee include researching issues pertaining to academic life, addressing related problems and attempting to find solutions which are then forwarded to John Lewis, Student Government president, and the Senate's academic policy committee for consideration.

Stevens said she "understands the feelings of hopelessness" which often discourage students, but added that one must speak up in order to be heard.

Stevens said that "bureaucracy and apathy are the enemies" and that the committee and Student Government are "here for the student body" to use. She voiced a desire for the entire organization to be confronted with "new ideas and new problems" and added that involvement is the key to improvement.

Dobbin speaks on identity of the University

(Editor's note: This is a prepared text of the inaugural address of the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president.)

Likewise, for almost a century and a half, women have been part of Villanova's life, often serving as the most conspicuous exemplars of loyalty to the institution. In an all-male institution until the 1940s, women generally filled subordinate but important staff positions. Now that we have achieved virtual parity in student enrollment between men and women, we have seen vividly the richness that women can bring to every aspect of the University's life. Clearly we are called to expand considerably the presence of women in our faculty and higher level administrative positions. The urgency of this call is prompted not simply by federal legislation, not simply, but surely, by the demands of justice, but by the quality of community life to which we aspire.

One of the positive signs of the times is our society's growing awareness of cultural differentiation within our world and within our own society itself. There is a strong consensus developing within American higher education of the need for preparing students to live in a more culturally diverse environment and on the importance of institutions themselves reflecting that diversity. This presents an exciting challenge to an institution which religiously and culturally identifies itself as "catholic" in the literal sense of the term. It is my firm conviction that a rich religious cultural tradition becomes richer and its identity more sharply focused when it interacts intelligently with other traditions. So again the Villanova community hears the call to broaden itself, this time to people of other race, color and economic class. Again the primary motive is the ideal of community to which we aspire.

6. A third Augustinian essential of Villanova's identity has to do with the unity of knowledge. The University's Mission Statement says: "Villanova emphasizes the disciplines of philosphy and religious studies." This is not intended to grant privileged status to two academic departments but to recognize that those disciplines are especially concerned with the intellectual traditions. For Augustine, philosphy and theology were virtually identical, largely due to his sense of the public, universal character of the Christian Message. Most often, when he employed the term "philosophy," he referred less to a particular subject of study than to an aspiration to unity which permeates all liberal study. He understood philosophy in its etymological sense as "a love of and desire for wisdom," which receives its ultimate satisfaction only in God. When he did speak of philosophy in a more specialized way, it was the higher discipline which enabled learners to integrate what they had discovered in the liberal arts and other learning experiences into a concentrated exploration of ultimate reality. Today, with the emergence of the empirical and hermeneutical methods employed by a vast array of specialized disciplines, philosophy and theology do not even aspire to be "higher" disciplines exercising hegemony over other fields of study. Rather, they are partners in the human quest for knowledge and wisdom, probing rigorously, with their own canons of inquiry and verification, broader questions of relevance to human life as a whole. The study of the liberal arts, the sciences and the practical professions within the context of this broader pursuit of wisdom is Villanova's ideal. John Henry Newman, in his classic The Idea of a University states aptly that "religious truth is not only a portion but a condition of general knowledge."

The integration we seek involves more than philosophical and theological questioning. While preserving the gains we have achieved in the rigor and specialization of the many disciplines in our curriculum, we must find ways of connecting the learning which is taking place within them. Learning must occur "across the curriculum." The learning of such skills as writing, logical reasoning, quantitative reasoning and ethical reasoning cannot be relegated solely to specialized introductory courses. We must take care to ensure that these skills are used and developed throughout the whole curriculum. Likewise, the content of courses across the curriculum must connect. For example, major scientific discoveries have moral, political, social, economic, even religious and philosophical implications. How are these multiple dimensions to be brought to bear on the scientific discovery under consideration without oversimplification? No one person possesses expertise in all of these areas. Increasingly, our faculty have been trained to a high degree of specialized expertise in their fields. Without wishing in the least to compromise that specialization, I am convinced that greater integration might be achieved by some creative curriculum designing, done by a faculty that appreciates the importance of integrated learning for the students and for themselves. In my own specialized academic career, I have often discovered the richest insights for my specialized study through interdisciplinary connections. One of my delights since coming to Villanova last year has been observing a definite interest among some of our faculty in favor of such integration of learning, as well as the further integration of theoretical learning with practice, of classroom with life. I intend to encourage these possibilities as especially consonant with Villanova's mission.

The few essentials of Villanova's identity, which I have been describing succinctly and somewhat abstractly, translate into concrete courses of action for the University's future. Villanova has no intention of increasing the size of its student enrollment. In fact, our undergraduate population is now beyond our desired expectations, due to an unexpectedly high yield of accepted incoming freshmen this year. In the future we intend to reduce slightly and to control more carefully the size of our student body. The growth for which we shall plan is a growth in quality: quality of life on campus and quality in all programs. These are some of the specific initiatives under consideration:

1. On-campus housing for at least 1,400 more of our students than we can house at present. Approximately 94 percent of our applicants seek resident status which is available for fewer than 50 percent of our undergraduates. This forces literally thousands of our students to find off-campus housing with the ensuing stresses placed both upon the quality of student life and upon the relationship of the University with its neighbors. We shall plan this new housing to be aesthetically and functionally conducive to the intellectual, cultural and social ambiance which we seek for our students.

2. We are in the process of establishing several task forces to study and to make recommendations concerning the quality of life at Villanova. Two of these will report directly to the President. One committee will study ways of heightening the intellectual and cultural atmosphere on campus. Villanova's academic programs, on the one hand, and its student life programs, on the other hand, have been becoming better and better. We want to bring them closer together. Learning is not restricted to the classroom, laboratory or library, nor is enjoyment restricted to extracurricular activity. A member of our StudentLife staff recently remarked to me that we are coming more and more to view our student activities as cocurricular rather than as extracurricular. We are confident that we can find concrete ways to making these integrations and thereby raising Villanova up another notch in academic excellence.

A second committee reporting to the President will study the Catholic character and ambience of life at the University. The committee will make concrete recommendations for fostering a dynamic Catholic Christian environment at Villanova which is truly ecumenical in the sense described above.

3. The additions or replacements of physical facilities, for which we are strategically planning, also are intended strictly to enhance the quality of life and programs. They include: a) New office space for faculty and administrative staff. (Current space is woefully inadequate.) b) A modern health care facility that will provide more adequately for the physical and psychological well-being of the members of our University community. (This will replace an infirmary that is more than 50 years old). c) State of the art science and engineering laboratories and seminar space to provide the integrated quality of learning which we plan to provide.

4. I mention a final initiative, which we are planning, because it is so crucial to the success of two of the strategic objectives considered in my remarks on Villanova's identity. Villanova needs desperately to increase its endowment. Using income generated by endowment is the most sensible way for the University to provide financial aid to students of low and middle income families who increasingly are finding Villanova too expensive to attend. We are deeply committed to control costs even as we seek greater excellence. We realize that raising tuition to provide financial aid to the less fortunate is an inefficient way of keeping Villanova open to students of varied economic background. Income generated by endowment raised for that purpose would be a preferable and fairer alternative. Also, endowed chairs or professorships might be very attractive gifts for donors interested in enabling Villanova's increasing pursuit of research oriented teacher/scholars.

Finally, these remarks on Villanova's identity — who we are and what we hope to become — are the observations of one person. One person's perceptions do not constitute nor do they adequately express an institution's identity. I pledge myself to work with all Villanova constituencies in bringing the University's identity to even sharper and richer focus.

I have a special message for one constituency, my fellow alumni and alumnae. You are the largest, and undoubtedly a very important, repository of Villanova's collective consciousness. No one knows better than you of Villanova's extraordinary knack of engendering deep loyalty, affection and love in those who work and study here and then continue to identify with us long after they depart. Let me assure you that this spirit is still alive at Villanova among the students, faculty and staff, even as the University has grown in size and stature as an academic institution. The students especially, many of them your sons and daughters, have been a delight to me since I have taken office. I have been impressed with the friendliness, poise, interest and obvious talents of so many students who, on their own initiative, have welcomed me, congratulated me, advised me about their own activities and offered me advice about my own. If the students are any indication, Villanova's momentum is undoubtedly upward.

Finally, to our distinguished guests and friends from outside the Villanova community: Although my remarks have concentrated internally on Villanova's identity, they are presented with a sure awareness of your presence and for your benefit as well as our own. Villanova enjoys and anticipates cordial, friendly and productive relations with all of you, in so many different ways. It is my hope that a Villanova, self-aware and willing to share that self-awareness, might be a more suitable partner in our many shared endeavors.

I thank all of you wholeheartedly for your presence here today.

Bush, Dukakis discussed

Juniors and seniors were the most conservative, with 66 percent saying they were conservative or moderately conservative. Graduate students were the most liberal, with 56 percent describing themselves as liberal or moderately liberal.

Sixty-nine percent of the students polled overall considered Villanova students as more conservative, while 22 percent said they were more liberal.

Debates

Of the two debates between the presidential candidates, 85 percent of the students polled said they watched a portion of at least one and 48 percent said they watched both.

For the vice-presidential candidates' debate, 58 percent of the students watched a portion while 42 percent did not watch.

Bentsen vs. Quayle

Concerning the vice-presidential candidates, 61 percent of students surveyed regarded Sen. Dan Quayle unfavorably while 58 percent of the students considered Sen. Lloyd Bentsen favorably.

When asked for whom they would vote if Bentsen and Quayle were the presidential candidates for their respective parties, 67 percent replied that they would vote for Bentsen. Twenty-seven percent said they would vote for Quayle and 6 percent would vote for neither.

Eighty-six percent of the students registered in the Democratic Party would vote for Bentsen over Quayle if they were running as presidential candidates, while 14 percent would vote for Quayle. More Democrats would vote for Bentsen as president than the 64 percent who said they would vote for Dukakis over Bush.

Fifty-nine percent of Republicans said they would vote for Bentsen and only 32 percent would vote for their own party's candidate, Quayle. The weak support for Quayle is in sharp contrast with the strong Republican support for Bush.

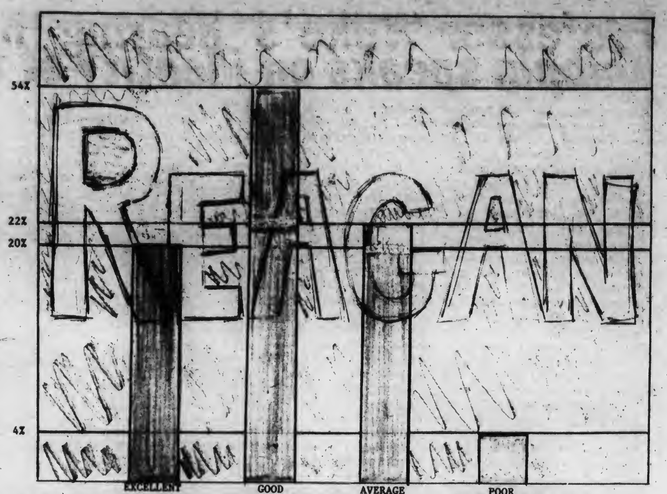
Among no-party voters, 82 percent would vote for Bentsen, with only 15 percent voting for Quayle.

As to the importance of the presidential candidates' choices for running mates, 16 percent of the students surveyed considered the selection of a running mate to be very important, 58 percent said it was somewhat important and 22 percent regarded it as a small or unimportant factor.

Ronald Reagan

The students surveyed seemed satisfied with President Ronald Reagan's two terms in office. Twenty percent said Reagan did an excellent job, 54 percent said he did a good job, 22 percent said he did an average job and only 4 percent said he did a poor job.

Among Republican students, 88 percent said that Reagan had done good or excellent as president.



Among Democratic students, 34 percent said Reagan did a good job, 26 percent said Reagan had done an average job in office and 34 percent said Reagan had done poorly as president

Sixty-two percent of undeclared students said Reagan had done a good job, while 31 percent considered Reagan as average in office.

Among males, 83 percent regarded Reagan's term in office as good or excellent, while only 66 percent of females said they were as satisfied with Reagan as president.

No freshman or sophomore students surveyed said Reagan had done a poor job as president, while 13 percent of the graduate students surveyed said he had done poorly.

Eighty-two percent of the undergraduates surveyed said Reagan had done good or excellent, while only 47 percent of the graduates said he had done that well.

Reagan vs. Dukakis

When given a choice between Reagan and Dukakis for president, 75 percent of the students surveyed said they would vote for Reagan while only 23 percent would vote for Dukakis.

Eighty-two percent of the male students surveyed said they would vote for Reagan over Dukakis, as compared with only 66 percent of female students surveyed.

Campus papers criticized

By College Press Service

In one of the most vocal and organized protests against a newspaper on record, nearly 300 Iowa City residents purchased and signed an ad criticizing the right-wing University of Iowa (UI) Campus Review for promoting violence against minorities and homosexuals.

"Their basic gay bashing and lesbian bashing attitude is ugly," said Richard Zimmermann, an Iowa City attorney who signed the ad. "It's a rag."

The Review, said Zimmermann, has outraged Iowa City residents more in recent weeks with increased attacks on homosexuals and people with AIDS. "Their facts are substantially distorted and their views are sick."

The half-page advertisement appeared in the Oct. 4 issue of the Daily Iowan, the main student paper, and was signed by 292 students, faculty members and Iowa City residents. The ad condemned "the recent attempts by the Campus Review to incite hatred and violence against minorities, especially lesbians, gays, feminists and persons with AIDS."

"While we recognize the views expressed in the Campus Review are those of a tiny fanatical minority," the ad continued, "we believe it is important to renew the commitment of this community to fight against hatred and intolerance and reaffirm our commitment to human rights."

"Here's the question I have for them: Can they point to one example when we have incited violence? The answer is no," replied Campus Review Editor Jeff Renander. "We're doing nothing different than the National Lampoon or any other humor magazine."

"The whole thing is a sham," Renander said of the ad. "These people are fundamentally intolerant of people and ideas they don't agree with."

The Campus Review is not the first conservative student newspaper to come under fire.

In March, Dartmouth College President James Freedman criticized the controversial Dartmouth Review, funded in part by the same New York group that helped start Iowa's conservative paper, for "poisoning the intellectual environment of our campus." The Dartmouth faculty later passed a resolution endorsing the sentiment.

The Dartmouth Review has sparked intense feelings on campus for years. Founded in 1980, the Review has earned a reputation for insulting women, gays and minorities in a glib manner that was later mimicked by other conservative campus papers.

Conservative newspapers at the universities of California-Davis and California-San Diego, Miami and Cornell, to name just a few, have been criticized by students and faculty as racist, sexist and homophobic. Still, few protests against the papers have been as organized and broad as that against the Campus Review.

"They have a right to publish their paper under the First Amendment," Zimmermann said. "But it's fairly hateful information. Responsible citizens have to stand up and say this isn't right. You have to tell the community this stuff isn't credible."

"If people don't make statements opposing these attitudes, there's an assumption that everyone is in agreement with them," added Karla Miller, the director of UI's Rape Victim Advocacy Program. "This is not a direct challenge for them [the Campus Review] to respond. Rather, it's a community combining in an outcry that says this hatred and oppression must stop."

Dems

easily."

"For college students, the image of the Republicans is one of good economic times," noted Eric Davis, a political scientist at Vermont's Middlebury College. "Carter and Mondale are the Democrats college students remember. Students aren't old enough to remember a Democratic administration that was 'successful.'"

Whatever the case, Miller figures the best way to improve his group's campus fortunes is by raising money. "After the election," he promises, "we'll make contact with all campuses and all chairmen of Students for Dukakis. We'll firm up our contacts, and start a nationwide fundraising campaign."

How the poll was done

The poll, conducted Oct. 26-29, questioned 153 students randomly selected from a listing of 11,443 graduates and undergraduates.

Forty-seven students who were also selected for the sample could not be polled. The editors realize that the failure to reach that portion of the sample precludes the possibility of the survey meeting the standards of scientific polling.

But, as Dr. Arthur Shriberg said of his 1986 report on student life at the University, "We trust you will consider this report in the context of someone who shows you a snapshot taken from a specific camera at one point in time." The picture may be somewhat grainy, but we feel the major figures are still visible.

Most people were contacted by telephone.

The following assisted in the poll: Diane Cilione, Noel Falco, Kevin Heil, Barbara Kresch, Tim Lowry, Dan Moriarty, Stephen Powers, Jennifer Reidy, Dante Scala and Maureen Stapleton.

Professor Wilke's hearing held will eventually make a recommendation to the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, who will make the final decision.

Wilke requested the hearing after he was notified in June of the University's intention to dismiss him. The University revoked the sabbatical that Wilke was scheduled to take this semester, and he is currently on leave with pay, according to Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice president for academic affairs, in the Oct. 28 issue of the Villanovan.

Various student complaints since 1981 have had a "cumulative effect" on Wilke's teaching effectiveness in his television production course, said the Rev. Kail C. Ellis, O.S.A., dean of the College of Arts and Sciences during his testimony.

Brinn McGrath, a 1987 Villanova graduate who was enrolled in the course, testified that Wilke "didn't have the human part of a teacher, such as understanding, caring and the professional aspect of teaching.

"I was very tense in class, very miserable and I had no confidence ... I was afraid to make a mistake," McGrath said.

Mary Beth McQuade, a 1987 graduate and student of Wilke's, commented during the hearing that he "prepared a student for the real outside world and emphasized student initiative," and gave "constructive criticism" that she did not find demeaning in any way.

Leonard Formato, a student in the TV production course, described it as "the best class I've ever taken at this school ... [and Wilke as] the best teacher I've ever had."

He continued, "He would help you, but he would rather you do it yourself.

"That's the way the real world works," Formato said. He commented that the other students in the class "didn't really give a damn."

Cullen questioned McGrath about her internship at KYW-TV and asked, "Is it ruthless [there]?"

"No. I am very comfortable with the people I work for ... I don't hesitate to ask a question," McGrath replied.

Michael Solomon, a 1980 graduate currently enrolled in University College, explained that Wilke often "kidded around" in class, but that "100 percent of the students knew when he was kidding."

Solomon continued, "He did not deflect questions from the class ... in a production course, like driving a car, you have to learn it by yourself."

"I will be saddened if he is dismissed, and I would leave Villanova if he is dismissed," said Solomon.

James Burns, a 1987 graduate, was a member of a 1986 TV production class in which Wilke failed each student on their final projects. The group submitted a letter to Warren Richardson, communication arts department chairperson, "as a result of a long, stressful semester with Professor Wilke," Burns said.

Richardson subsequently met with Wilke to discuss the student complaints. Richardson testified that Wilke told him, "The students today are not bright anymore, and they have no interest."

"I told him that I thought it was inconsistent that incoming students to Villanova have higher SAT scores every year," he said.

During his testimony, Wilke explained that "I never said that it [the decline of quality students] had anything to do with intelligence ... They simply do not want to take a risk. They are no longer creative, they have no initiative or interest."

Wilke recounted a period of time in 1986 when "I noticed what I had been doing wasn't working. I asked myself, 'Was I burned out? Was the problem me?'

"At this time in my life, I may have transmitted this anger more than I thought. My 'evil twin' may have emerged during this period, and for that I am very sorry," Wilke said.

Robert Curtiss, a technician who assisted Wilke during the television production course, came to Ellis earlier this year with a series of complaints about Wilke. Ellis said that Curtiss wished to "bare his chest" before he left Villanova due to health problems.

When Ellis asked Curtiss to document his complaints, Curtiss responded that "it would take volumes," Ellis said. Curtiss told him that Wilke intimidated him, and Curtiss asked, "How long before I can get out of town?"

Alice Ballard, attorney for Wilke, asked Ellis if he attempted to "get the other side of the story." Ellis responded that he "did not solicit arguments for or against [Wilke]."

"You don't trust Professor Wilke, do you Fr. Ellis?" Ballard asked.

"At this point, no, I don't," Ellis replied. "I have had no complaints of this degree about the 300 other Arts and Sciences faculty."

Curtiss described in his statement an incident during Wilke's class in which Wilke affected a dialect and pretended to carry a television set on his shoulder while walking down the street after he had shown a tape of the racial riots after Martin Luther King Jr.'s death.

Curtiss also wrote about two Hispanic sisters who were enrolled in the television production course whom Wilke referred to as "The Cha Cha sisters." He also wrote that Wilke would often make fun of Italian names during roll at the beginning of class. "I may have said, 'Why aren't there more Irish names — they're easier to pronounce,'" Wilke testified. However, he denied the other allegations.

In 1981, the University received a letter from a woman who was a former International Radio and Television Society (IRTS) intern, claiming she had been treated in an "unflattering way" by Wilke, Ellis said. Wilke met the woman at a IRTS convention that year, and allegedly told her that her position sounded like "a high class hooker's job." Wilke responded that he did not recall the remark.

The charge of sexual harassment originated from a secretary in the communication arts department. Wilke admitted to referring to her as "big boobs," and said he gave her a "heartfelt apology" after the incident. "I didn't intend to hurt her. I thought the issue was resolved after that point [when he apologized]," Wilke said.

The secretary said in a closed testimony that Wilke later entered the communication arts office and turned his chair towards her so as to stare at her for 20 minutes. Wilke denied the charge, and told the committee, "She said, 'You're staring at me.' I said, 'No I'm not.' After that I got up and left to avoid any possible claims of sexual harassment."

Dr. Edwin Goff, philosophy professor and president of the Villanova chapter of the American Association of University Professors (AAUP), testified for the defense in regards to procedural policy. "If we allow intuition to overrule procedure, then we endanger the integrity of the findings themselves.

"In principle, if we don't follow procedures, we have no way to determine whether Professor Wilke is the most complained about professor at Villanova," Goff said.

Goff cited AAUP policies concerning "preliminary proceedings on the fitness of faculty." He listed three steps that the AAUP recommends a University follow in regards to faculty: first, the chairperson should discuss the problems/complaints with the faculty member; second, an ad hoc committee of the department should be created to evaluate and arbitrate its findings with the professor; and third, if necessary, formal hearing proceedings should be pursued.

Goff said that "efforts were made" concerning the first step, but that step two was not established "where there was room for adjustments ... where the charges were not so severe so as to warrant loss of tenure."

Goff voiced the opinion of the AAUP that the Wilke case had gone "too far, too fast and unnecessarily."

"It is the intent of preliminary proceedings to prevent such drastic measures [as the hearing]," he said.

He stressed the AAUP policy that "it is important to protect academic freedom in the classroom."

According to the Faculty Dismissal and Suspension Procedure outlined in the faculty handbook, preliminary procedures such as the ones outlined by Goff in his testimony do not exist in Villanova policy.

Ballard argued in her closing argument that "negligence is not a sufficient charge for dismissal."

Cullen said later that the three charges brought against Wilke "constitute gross misconduct [and therefore sufficient cause for dismissal] ... They are also a breach of contract by themselves."

Ballard reinforced Goff's testimony and said, "Procedures are not just technicalities ... we must protect faculty members to determine the way to teach, and to learn from their mistakes."

She continued that Wilke had received "more feedback today than he's gotten from the administration over the past years ... I believe that he was definitely surprised when he received the letter of dismissal [from the president].

"Professor Wilke had no opportunity to learn, readjust or counsel. Mr. Richardson failed to perform his job," Ballard said.

"In sexual harassment cases, one hopes to educate, not assassinate," she said.

"This is not a blatant case," Ballard concluded. "It is a mixed case regarding one course."

Both parties will receive transcripts of the hearing, after which each may present additional evidence in written briefs within 20 days, Mathis said. The committee will make a recommendation to the president no later than 30 days after the deadline for filing briefs. Dobbin will make the final decision on the case 30 days after the committee has submitted its findings.

He said the University would like especially to "alert students to the problem and help them to learn their rights." He added that the University is also "exploring [an] alternative" to the present situation.

Also, Farsaci said he is optimistic that the opening of new south campus dormitories with 260 beds will alleviate some of the problems next fall.

John Lewis, Student Government president, noted a Scranton, Pa. case where this kind of zoning law is being examined because it may prove discriminatory. Lewis said he believes the local zoning laws are also specifically designed against "students and lower income individuals."

Adding that student expenditures and service in the community are of immeasurable benefit, Lewis said he is both "frustrated and concerned" that Villanova students are generally treated with so little respect.

Women's issues task force

McCauley said.

The task force includes six committee members, along with Dr. Edward L. Collymore, director of the Office of Social Action Programs.

McCauley said that the committee's "brainstorming" has produced three main objectives for the task force. First, it would like to invite speakers to come to the University to heighten the awareness of women's issues in the community, as well as to spark the interest of the community.

McCauley said that the second objective of the task force would be to develop a women's resource center where an assortment of information would be available. The resource center would also include a newsletter, which McCauley hopes would be published each semester.

The task force has just finished developing a survey that could be distributed among staff, faculty and students in order to accurately gauge the opinions and needs of the community, McCauley said.

The task force has looked to other universities' women's programs for ideas. "We have looked at a wide range of universities and colleges like University of Delaware, a public, coeducational school, and Wellesley College, a private women's college," McCauley said.

McCauley said that, although the task force is not associated with Students Against Sexual Stereotyping (SASS), she believes that as "groups with similar interests, it would be in our favor to align ourselves."

The task force, as opposed to SASS, would become a "vehicle for insuring that the number of women in the staff and faculty remains reasonably equal, as well as insuring that both men's and women's salaries are equal," she said.

Ed Sullivan for state senate

Cynics and Republicans will surely scoff at our endorsement of Ed Sullivan for state senator from the 17th district. Surprise, surprise, they will say with a smirk, noting that Sullivan is a Villanovan, the associate director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

It is true that part of Sullivan's appeal stems from his membership in the Villanova community. We agree with U.S. Sen. Al Gore, who came to the University Wednesday to support Sullivan — it would be nice to have a Villanovan in the state senate, for obvious reasons.

But our support of Ed Sullivan is deeper than the bonds of community kinship we share with him, deeper than simple self-interest. A look at the man himself reveals a person with compassion and vision, a person of quality. It is this quality which sparks our enthusiasm for this candidate.

We have seen, for instance, his involvement in the Center for Peace and Justice Education, one of the few hotbeds of social activism on an all-too-quiet campus. Sullivan joined students last spring on a march across campus to bring to light the submerged issue of University investment in South Africa. We feel confident that Sullivan will stride through the halls of Harrisburg with the same willingness to challenge he held when walking through the halls of Tolentine toward the president's office.

In the Center for Peace and Justice Education, politics is approached with passion, not with the empty platitudes of bloated bureaucracies which have lost their direction. Politics is not the triumph of style over substance, but is generated by a genuine concern for the human condition. In his role as educator and associate director at the center, Sullivan has been part of the effort which has sparked student concern over a wide range of social issues.

Indeed, Sullivan's support of education has been one of the main messages of his campaign. He has said he will support state aid for higher education, both in terms of loans and scholarships, in response to the national cutback in student aid. "We cannot allow our society to become two-tiered — those who can afford to be educated and those who can't," he has said.

Sullivan has also pinpointed another issue of immediate concern, the protection of our troubled environment. In a world where dead dolphins wash up on beaches and "long-term" problems are having immediate effects, such concern is urgently needed.

Sullivan's promise to remain in contact with his constituents during his term is also encouraging. His feeling that people feel alienated from their government is on target, and we feel he will not allow himself to lose touch with the people of his district.

Sullivan is, by his own admission, somewhat of a long shot. He compared his race Wednesday to the 1985 miracle game Villanova played against Georgetown in the NCAA basketball championships.

This time, however, the heroes cannot be Jensen, Pinckney and Pressley. This time, the heroes will be the figures behind the voting booth's curtain. On Tuesday, vote Ed Sullivan.

Exercise your right to vote

Many Villanova students will have their first opportunity to cast their ballots for a United States president next Tuesday. We must realize our patriotic duties and vote intelligently for the candidate of our choice.

The right to vote in America is perhaps one of the most important elements of a democratic society and should not be taken for granted.

Throughout American history, people have fought for equal rights and we must respect their efforts by responsibly casting our votes on Tuesday.

Alumni disrespectful

To the Editor:

As a student and resident at Villanova, I was shocked at the behavior of some of the alumni on Homecoming Weekend Oct. 29.

Here were the distinguished graduates in all of their glory. They all came to show their appreciation by having a tailgating party.

By the end of the day, the lots and fields in front of the duPont Pavilion looked like a garbage dump, to say the very least. There were cans and other debris lying about the place. The campus, or at least the area where the alumni were partying, was wrecked.

This "I came, I saw, I trashed" attitude of people who want to do their damage where I live disturbs me.

As if the events outside were not offending enough, some alumni made their move on the bottom floor of Bartley Hall.

Yes, someone visiting the campus for the first time for Homecoming could go there and see such appealing sights such as bottles and papers left without regard and other things that were so repulsive that it would be in bad taste to repeat them in this letter. I am sure the visitor would be impressed.

Now I know that there are some alumni who came by to seriously visit the campus and capture some old memories. But it seemed that the only places where there was excessive noise and pollution were right next to the signs marked "Alumni Parking Here" and "Alumni Meeting Here."

This "I came, I saw, I trashed" attitude of people who want to do their damage where I live disturbs me.

Perhaps the guilty ones would see things differently if the student body came over to their houses and destroyed where they had to live.

Students must retain freedom of expression

By TOM McPHERSON

By now we all know that Playboy magazine will be interviewing this week for its "Women of the Big East" pictorial. There are a lot of people who hope that Villanova students will not participate, and I am one of them.

I take great pride in Villanova, and I would hate to see it embarrassed. For the past few weeks many groups and individuals have given their advice and support to our female students through everyday conversations, Sunday sermons and letters and quotes in the newspapers. Most of this advice has been heartfelt and sincere.

The problem that I have is with a quote in the article "Playboy edition stirs controversy," that appeared in the Oct. 29 issue of the Villanovan.

The article laid out the facts leading up to the controversy and the University's response to the campaign, hoping for its rejection. The Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, made the statement that "People are free to decide whatever they want to do," and then went on to quote from the Code of Student Conduct.

It was a section concerning possible disciplinary action for off-campus behavior problems that involve the University's reputation. Something sounded wrong to me when I read that.

As a first-year law student here, I have only just begun to learn all about the U.S. Constitution; but you do not have to be on law review to know that the First Amendment protects freedom of expression.

I decided to do some checking in the law library to see if this issue had ever come up before. The amount of my own required work kept me from doing as thorough a job as I would have liked, but I did not find any cause that was factually similar.

Yet, whether the other cases dealt with state schools, on-campus incidents or minors, the Supreme Court was very clear on one point. A school's prohibition of expression can only be sustained for conduct that would "materially and substantially interfere with the requirements of appropriate discipline in the operation of the school." Tinker v. Des Moines School Dist., 393 U.S. 509. The court also showed a continuous disapproval of the 'chilling effect' that school sanctions can have on students' free expression.

The University would most likely argue that the Playboy campaign would affect its reputation and its functioning as an academic community. I do not dispute the first half of this argument.

I graduated from Villanova in May and I can remember how mad I was when Gary McClain sold us out to Sports Illustrated for $40,000.

But, I seriously doubt that a court would hold that an adult woman, in exercising her right to freedom of expression by posing for a commercial magazine, would substantially interfere with the operation of the school in the manner required by the Supreme Court.

But Playboy and the Big East and the Supreme Court are not really the big issues here. What had upset me the most was the fact that intimidation and fear of disciplinary action were even mentioned.

Although it was just meant to be a warning of possible consequences, the school should have realized that this section of the Code of Student Conduct did not legally apply to a student's lawful off-campus freedom of expression. (Especially if a first-year law student could begin to find a legal basis to that conclusion in half an afternoon.)

Of course, I understand the University's need to protect its reputation, but the students should not be coerced into refraining from unpopular behavior.

Students should be offered guidance using care and reason and most importantly, respect. We are not children anymore, we are young adults. I seriously hope that the administration reflects on the way it interacts with the student body, presently and in the future.

Intimidation is not becoming of any academic institution, let alone Villanova. It is not very enlightening, and it is not very responsible. But above all, it is not very Christian.

Tom McPherson is a student at Villanova Law School, class of 1991.

Basketball Club responds

To the Editor:

We, the executive board of the Wildcat Basketball Club, are writing this letter in response to the unjust negative feedback recently received. The Basketball Club takes offense in being used as the scapegoat for the lack of seats in duPont Pavilion, lack of student seating, and high ticket prices. We have no control over these elements. When a limit is placed on ticket sales, someone will be disappointed.

The Basketball Club exists as a student-run organization whose primary purpose remains raising school spirit. We continually strive to keep open the lines of communication with the administration, Athletic Department, ticket and Student Activities Offices, yet find ourselves left in the dark when decisions have been made.

A prime example of this arose when the ticket office decided to open student ticket sales on Oct. 3 instead of the promised Oct. 17. Therefore, no fault can be found with our organization which planned to explain all options at the informational meeting held Oct. 4.

We did exactly that despite great public criticism. We repeated ourselves three times and opened the meeting to questions to avoid all confusion. Also, it is not the responsibility of the Basketball Club to announce ticket office sales.

Let us just address the major criticisms that have arisen. First of all, throughout the history of the Basketball Club, ticket sales have always taken place on a school day during class hours. The price has always included club fees which go right back to the students, covering transportation and handouts.

In years past a controller was mandatory to purchase student tickets and the sheets could handle up to twelve. That number was derived due to the fact that a row in Jake Nevin Fieldhouse consists of 12 seats, yet no limit had ever been prescribed as to the number of sheets allowed to be submitted. This year a controller was optional. If your schedule conflicted with the sales, a friend could stand in.

Also, in years prior, the Basketball Club was given exclusive right to selling student seats. Last year, a complaint was voiced of a monopoly, especially for those who did not wish to join the club. For this reason, members of the executive board met with administration over summer recess to establish a figure for student sales controlled by the Basketball Club.

The largest criticism stems for the so-called "luxury" price of tickets. This season the cost of tickets was $100 which included all home games, Spectrum games, club fees and two additional games at the Palestra, not included in the ticket office package!

The ticket office quotes a price to our organization every year, and due to their decision to increase the cost of each ticket by $2, the club's prices naturally reflected that edict. We do not profess to be a perfect entity, and do not appreciate grievances directed where they do not belong.

The largest domain for advertising is this paper itself. If an individual neglected to watch for the ads as he/she was advised to, one could have opened his eyes to the banners, pamphlets and posters that were hung. It is incredible to reflect on last year's ticket sales which lasted for three days and never sold out.

This year is a classic example of the bandwagon effect. We expected people to realize the demand for tickets and obviously 1,300 individuals did! True fans even turned up at 6 a.m.

For Francisco Palacios, and all others who seriously believe that the Basketball Club is the root of all evil, we cordially invite you to contact us personally. We are located in Dougherty 109.

Lastly, we wouldlike to express our appreciation and gratitude to Coach Roland V. Massimino and our advisor, the Rev. William Maguire, O.S.A., for their continued support and encouragement, both past and present, for what the Basketball Club stands for — school spirit!

Refuse Playboy

To the Editor:

On Nov. 7, at 3:30 p.m., on the sidewalk of St. David's Inn, there will be a media-covered rally and march held in protest of the interviewing of Villanova women for the upcoming Playboy issue on Women of the Big East.

Our school's name and students are involved, therefore, we as Villanovans will be represented in this issue. All members of the Villanova community should take a stand against the exploitation of its name and its students.

If you are concerned about the exploitation of women and sexism in any of its forms, or are worried about the reputation of the school, take this opportunity to demonstrate your feelings by supporting the march and rally on Monday.

Brach responds to accusations

By PHILIP BRACH

Since I have been at Villanova University, I have been critical of the Athletic Department, the academics, the townships, the student life area, and even the Villanovan. Anyone who has worked closely with me on any of these issues understands that these criticisms come from a genuine concern and effort to make Villanova the best it can be.

Never in any of those cases have I been made to feel so alienated as I do in relation to the criticism of the Greek system in the October issue of the Pelican. This could not have been more evident than in the personal attack that Craig Zappetti wrote in the last issue of the Villanovan.

I would like to first clarify that I do not have and never have had a personal and or professional relationship with Zappetti. I find it appalling that he would engage in such a personal attack, implying that such a relationship existed.

Though they may not agree on my position on Greek issues, Greek leaders like Lee Losciale, Sean Closkey, Michelle Viex and Rob Colton can testify that I worked to represent all Villanovans.

If a Greek were to imply that any or all of my accomplishments did not benefit him or herself it would be saying that they themselves are not Villanovans.

I am sure that Zappetti's letter was written in a state of high emotions and thus he overlooked factual information. This was evident in that as co-chairman of the committee to respond to the 1987 Greek evaluation, Zappetti suggested he was not aware of any facts similar to mine in the report.

I would hope that he was aware of the content of page 63 of this report. I would hope the allegations on this page were as alarming to him as they were to me, and that he planned to respond to them instead of pretending they were not there.

In addition I am sure that Zappetti understands that Villanova Greeks cannot excuse themselves from national statistics about Greek systems. If they represent true brother and sisterhood no matter where problems occur, it is a reflection of the organization as a whole.

Furthermore, Zappetti states that these statistics come from public schools as a whole instead of private. He may want to ask himself why out of the 200-plus Catholic colleges and universities only a handful allow fraternities and sororities to exist.

But what disturbs me the most is Zappetti's accusation that Student Government has had "fraudulent elections." If he had researched this point at all, he would have known that the elections are not run by Student Government but in fact by an independent council appointed through the Dean of Students Office. His accusation attacks the integrity of the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, and he should bring forth proof or he owes Stack a public apology.

In conclusion, I would like to express my sincerest appreciation to those who have engaged in this ongoing debate with me on a much higher level than Zappetti chose. Among them I would like to especially thank other Lambda Chi Alpha brothers, Pat Donohoe and Gary Bonas. Together we can make Villanova the best it can be.

Dukakis misinterpreted

To the Editor:

I am writing this letter in response to the "National Right to Life" newspaper that I recently saw in the Connelly Center. After reading this paper, I can conclude that it is either trying to hide something or it pitifully lacks insight (probably both).

It paints Gov. Michael S. Dukakis as being "pro-abortion" and Vice President George Bush as being "pro-life." Both of these statements are completely unfounded.

First, to call Dukakis "pro-abortion" is a fallacy. He does support the continued legalization of abortion. But this does not make him "pro-abortion." He believes that the decision whether or not to have an abortion should be left entirely to the woman. He believes that the federal government cannot dictate such a personal decision.

Secondly, to call Bush "pro-life" is equally ludicrous. The paper was unwilling to tell its readers that while Bush opposes the legalization of abortion, he supports the death penalty. A human life is ended in the execution of a prisoner, in this case by a government agency.

Bush also supports the further stockpiling of nuclear weapons. Surely these two positions are not conducive to a "pro-life" platform.

Bush can use allusions like his "thousand points of light" to give voters the feeling that he is "pro-life." But a more careful examination of the issues involved will show who is the true "pro-life" candidate.

Professor refutes parking fine

The following is a letter sent to Rowan P. Kelly, chief of Security, and reprinted with permission.

Enclosed please find $80 fine for having my sticker stolen on the campus. Please issue another sticker.

If the sticker is a commodity as you described it on the telephone, then this commodity certainly does not cost $80. I wonder how you arrived at this figure. I understand that it is a parking fee for the entire academic year that the faculty and others pay for the privilege of using the parking space on the campus. Some years ago, this fee did not even exist.

If it is a fine, then I wonder what would happen if a typewriter or computer is stolen from my office, would I or my administrative assistant be called upon to pay for it, along with a fine that you may determine for this theft? During the day, I do not lock my office every time I walk out for any little business.

Instead of going after the thief, you are penalizing a property holder! Even under Stalin or Hitler, the sense of justice was never so twisted.

This policy violates normal standards of justice and fair play of the United States and the legal norms established by the U.S. Constitution.

Punishing a victim for being a victim has never been practiced even in jails, concentration camps, or in police states. In which category, in your judgement, is Villanova University located?

Please explain.

The fine of $80 is being sent under protest. I promise to take this protest to other faculty members and appropriate university forums, with a hope that eventually this outrageously unjust and illegal practice will be discarded with an apology.

Policies are inconvenient

To the Editor:

Have you ever tried to duck out of the rain into the pie shop and found all the outside doors locked ... at noon? (One weekday last week seven of the nine doors to the day hop/pie shop were locked ... at noon!)

Have you ever tried to find a toilet during a run on the Jumbo Elliott track and found that all nearby doors to the field house and Butler were locked ... at noon! ... and that the nearest place to rinse a cinder from under a contact lense was five minutes away?

Have you ever tried to exit Connolly on a weekday at noon through a door with panic bars, only to find the bars chained ... three times in as many visits? (Forget about entering on the east side of the building, or using the nearest bathrooms if you are on the second floor east).

Must Security always dominate other considerations such as thoughtfulness, charity or simply the convenience of the campus population? After all, Mendel Hall contains items many times more valuable, volatile and vendable than any other building on campus, and all its doors are open all day.

Respect astronomers

To the Editor:

For some reason the astronomy department at Villanova gets no respect. Students are always asking astronomy majors, "What can you do with an astrology degree?"

In reality, astronomy is a hard science and majors in the field take many of the same upper level physics courses that physics majors do, as well as extensive computer programming. In their senior year they observe an average of two nights a week, a task which extends from dusk to dawn.

The astronomy department does more research per person than most other departments in the University.

Referring to an astronomy major as an astrology major is akin to calling a chemist a voodoo doctor.

Shape up with our own V.U. aerobics

By DAVID M. MELCHIORRE
Staff Reporter

Are you out of shape? Do you want to get involved in a stress-relieving, fun-filled activity? If so, Villanova has the answer to your prayers — aerobics!

Begun two years ago, the aerobics program at Villanova is coordinated by the intramural department. For the fee of $1 per workout, students can choose any one of the 11 workout sessions given at different times, Monday through Friday.

With five instructors leading these classes, anyone interested can find the class best suited to their schedule. Those who are not in the best of shape, and want to get into great shape, can start out slowly and work up to a more advanced level. Those who are already in shape can maintain their physiques through a fast-paced workout guaranteed to challenge them each time.

According to aerobics instructor Lisa Kennedy, "The workout really relieves stress, helps you feel better about yourself and is a great way to meet people." She also pointed out that aerobics is a terrific way for athletes to gain more flexibility and coordination.

Supported by the beat of motivating music, the aerobics workout consists of a warm-up period followed by a low intensity routine. The more difficult high intensity routine completes the program, with a five-minute cool-down at the end of the hour-long session.

The complete workout helps maintain body tone for those who participate, rather than gaining bulk as in weightlifting. For this reason, mainly women have been attracted to the program. However, Kennedy stresses that aerobics is an excellent way for everyone to get and stay in shape.

The hour-long aerobics sessions are held in the duPont Pavilion on Monday and Wednesday afternoons at 3:30, 4:45 and 6 p.m. The Friday session is held at 4 p.m., while there are two sessions on Tuesday and Thursday at 4 and 5 p.m.

The aerobics program is gaining popularity. Since it is an indoor sport, aerobics is a perfect winter activity. Kennedy also stated, "Aerobics seems to get very popular before spring break because everyone is trying to get into their bathing suits."

Whether your goal is trying to get into a bathing suit or not, aerobics is a fun way to get in shape and stay that way.

A retreat for the handicapped; a special event

By PATRICK MOUSSEAU
Staff Reporter

On the weekend of Oct. 7, you could have found Villanova students unloading duffle bags and chairs from cars and vans into the cabins at the Variety Club in Trooper, Pa.

What kind of chairs? Wheelchairs, of course. This was the 45th Handicapped Encounter Christ (H.E.C.) retreat.

It is not just an ordinary retreat where one listens and reflects, but an H.E.C. retreat. It is a normal retreat in many ways, with singing, talks, reflection periods and pizza. But, there is where the similarities end and everything else begins.

H.E.C. retreats were started in 1975 by John Keck, after he spent two years in a wheelchair. He learned firsthand about the discriminations against the handicapped. Furthermore, he saw that there were no organizations where the disabled could talk about and share their faith.

The first H.E.C. retreat was brought to Villanova in 1977 by the Rev. Shawn Tracy, O.S.A., director of Campus Ministry. Since then, there have been about four H.E.C.s a year. This particular H.E.C. had 55 participants. There are no mentally disabled people involved because the retreat is not equipped to handle them.

This H.E.C. retreat's theme was change. And what a change it was! I thought that college, independence and the new traffic signal on Lancaster were changes. All of a sudden new life was given to the word "change." An H.E.C. retreat may not change your life, but it will change your attitudes. You encounter the able-bodied and the disabled in an equal atmosphere. All defenses are dropped.

I found myself doing things that I had never done, nor even thought of doing before, like having a perfectly normal conversation with someone who uses a computerized voice to speak, or helping people eat marshmallows around a campfire.

Each talk and group discussion takes on a new and vibrant meaning, as old biases and ideas give way to new understanding. By the end of the retreat, you have to look hard to see other people's handicaps.

This last H.E.C. was my third. There is a certain magnetism about these weekends which can be hard to resist. It may be the freedom, the fellowship, the laughs or the love. Whatever it is, it is there. H.E.C. 46, ready or not, here I come!

V.U. band roadtrips to South

By SHEILA A. COURTER
Staff Reporter

In a conversation I had with a student I had just met, I mentioned that I was in the Villanova band.

His response was "Wow, do you sing?"

"No, not a rock band," I replied.

Though not always noticed, the band is an integral part of Villanova life. It plays at various functions, such as Special Olympics and Sunshine Day, as well as football and basketball games.

Each year, during fall break, the band embarks on what is known as its fall tour. This year the band boarded a Greyhound bus and headed south and, like James Taylor, they had Carolina on their minds.

The tour took the band to Roanoke Rapids, N.C.; Charleston, S.C.; and Williamsburg, Va. The majority of the week was spent in Charleston, where the band played concerts at elementary schools, St. John's Catholic, Stella Maris, and Summerville Catholic.

"Our intention over fall break was not to compete with other schools, but to touch the lives of kids," according to John Dunphy, band director and director of music activities. He believes people tend to associate the band with sports teams where there is always an existing rivalry. The band is not interested in this rivalry, but in making an impression where it will make a difference.

The Rev. Charles Day, pastor of St. Joe's Church, said "The interaction between the musicians and our children will leave lasting memories here."

Preparation for the week-long experience made everyone anxious to get underway.

As luck was on our side bringing with it temperatures in the 80s, the nearby beach attracted all. Our last night in South Carolina was spent around a bonfire, where all the pressures and worries of school seemed a million miles away. Freshmen Yanna and Yolanda Carter described it best, "we're like one big family."

The truth is this statement has been said before, and it seems that most band members experience this same feeling. Senior Peter Clerico said the times spent in South Carolina were "some of the best times he had ever spent with the band."

The ride home was much quieter than the one heading south, as most people began to bring their attentions back to books and away from the beach. As I was talking to our director, I was curious as to how he could tolerate young college students for an entire week.

He only seemed to laugh a little at my remark and proceeded to tell me he loved it. We are going to college to learn, and, as he so appropriately stated, "Education is taking people around and showing them things." This he did; he showed us a world we had never seen before.

Mass hits crescendo

By DAVID O'NEIL
Staff Reporter

For many Villanova students, Masses are an integral part of life. The Mass itself is made up of different parts, which all play an important role. But, one of the most important, and the hardest to agree on, is the music. Should it be lively, slow, loud or soft? What is the role of music in the liturgy?

Stegall gives the Villanova liturgy music that he says, "A believer will be able to sing and believe in."

This last question can be answered by the North American Bishops Committee on Music in Catholic Worship. In Section III, Article 24, it states in regard to liturgical music, "Music can also unveil a dimension of meaning and feeling, a communication of ideas and intuitions which words alone cannot yield ... Ideally, every communal celebration of faith should include music and singing."

Gary Stegall, the director of pastoral music, is in charge of the music for Villanova masses. He preserves the place of importance music has in the liturgy by picking songs which promote the different aspects of the Mass. For example,

Soap seeks campus site

College Press Services

Hoping to ingratiate itself to some of its most avid viewers, the "One Life To Live" television show is looking for a college campus on which to do some on-location production.

The ABC daytime drama has placed ads in 50 college papers asking students to write and explain why their campus would be the perfect location for several episodes featuring "Fraternity Row," the program's "soap within a soap."

While just choosing a campus might have been a more conventional way to select a location, "this was a way to increase college enthusiasm for the show," said Jason Bondeross, the show's spokesman. "There was already a large college audience and this was a way to get them more excited about the program. It was fun.

"We're very open. The campus has to be in the United States, but it can be big or small, rural or urban," said Bondeross.

ABC's research indicates many of "One Life To Live's" viewers are college students, Bondeross says.

The unusual approach to finding a campus site for the show, he added, is "a wonderful opportunity to make contact with the college audience."

John Loprieno and Marcia Cross are among the stars of ABC's "One Life to Live," a soap that is looking for a campus to tape on-location shots.

ABC would use the campus setting to portray the career of a young "actress," following her from modeling assignments to television commercials to her role in the fictional "Fraternity Row."

"Fraternity Row" also provides viewers with a "behind-the-scenes look at daytime television," Bondeross explains. And it also gives campuses a good chance to advertise themselves.

"From the number of college presidents, dean's offices and individual students who have called in," Bondeross says, "it's been a very effective ad."

When the opportunity arises, colleges do compete fiercely to get their names and even buildings included in movies and television shows. A number of schools campaigned in 1987 to host "A Different World," the Cosby Show spinoff that takes place on a campus.

Spellman College in Atlanta eventually won the chance, but, although many of the set designs are based on real rooms at Spellman, the show's producers ultimately dediced not to use footage of the campus itself.

Mass music enhances liturgy

an energetic song at the opening of the Mass causes people to come together through the music.

As Saint Augustine said, "To sing is to pray twice." Stegall uses the power of liturgical song to aid the masses in creating a community of students. He wants to provide a core of songs Villanova churchgoers will know well while adding a few new songs. The new songs will then become a part of that familiar core.

Stegall, by picking the best of the new and old music, gives the Villanova liturgy music that he says, "a believer will be able to sing and believe in."

He chooses the music with more than the Villanova community in mind. He chooses music which many different church communities know and use, therefore bringing Villanova into greater solidarity with other Catholic communities. Stegall wants a Villanova churchgoer to be able to go to any parish and find the music familiar.

The four church singing groups all have a student leader, and, together with Stegall, decide the music to be sung at mass. All the music is easy enough to be sung by all.

Gary Stegall is open to suggestions by the students, and his office is always open. Stegall, though a new addition to the Villanova community, plans to keep the Villanova tradition of church music.

Bulimia, anorexia-obsessions kill menstrual cycles.

Those who suffer from bulimia, a related eating disorder, have recurrent episodes of binge eating during which they consume anywhere from 10,000 to 20,000 calories in less than two hours. Bulimics most often binge on sweet, high caloric and easily digestible foods, such as ice cream and cake. After binging, victims will vomit, go to sleep, or Giaquinto stated, "The binging will cause so much pain that it will be too painful to continue." She added that the criteria for diagnosing bulimia is a minimum average of two binge eating episodes per week for at least three months.

Ninety-six percent of people who suffer from eating disorders are upper-middle class females, but Giaquinto stressed that eating disorders are transcending these boundaries. She added that the percentage of men with eating disorders is rising, especially among men involved in sports.

Giaquinto stated that the onset of anorexia is often around the ages of 12 to 14, but the onset for bulimia is later, usually between the ages of 20 and 29. There are few eating disorder victims over age 30.

The statistics surrounding eating disorder victims are disturbing. Eighty percent of anorexics become bulimic. Ninety percent of both anorexic and bulimics who are students have excellent grades. Twenty percent of females with anorexia will lose their period one year prior to other symptoms, something that can clue parents in on the disorder. Anorexics have a 5 to 10 pecent mortality rate, half of which is due to suicide.

According to Giaquinto, different studies show that anywhere from 5 to 20 percent of high school and college populations suffer from bulimia. Additionally, she explained that 50 percent of bulimics display other problematic behaviors such as alcohol abuse, drug addition or involvement in stealing or promiscuity.

Most experts agree that conflict in the family, school or social environment, peer pressure or parental pressure can trigger the onset of an eating disorder. Giaquinto explained, "We usually find that the fathers of eating disorder victims tend to be very old fashioned ... emotionally distant from the family ... You basically have very poor communication within the family."

Giaquinto, who also gives lectures on eating disorders, explained that during lectures she shows the audience photgraphs of Marilyn Monroe and Lauren Bacall and asks for their feedback. Members of the audience will say, "Well, I think they're fat." She explains, "You can see this is coming from the media blitz we're getting now."

> I'm so lonely it's pathetic. . .I have this void inside of me and I binge thinking it will make it better, but it doesn't.
> — an eating disorder victim

She added that when she speaks with people who suffer from eating disorders, "Peer pressure was so great ... They really wanted to fit in." For example, she said that some girls may have been on a cheerleading team where purging or food restriction was an accepted method of weight control. She also stated that some girls may have been told by their boyfriends that they were fat and they started dieting. "It's very addicting behavior and they got swept up in it."

Giaquinto explained that anorexics are perfectionists and achievement oriented. Additionally, they suffer from feelings of isolation, insecurity, and poor self-esteem. She added, "The anorexic tries to control her life by controlling her body. Usually her life is very chaotic and this is the only way she has in which to gain some type of control."

Bulimics have many of the same personality characteristics as anorexics, but Giaquinto added that if one meets a bulimic, one probably would not know it. They tend to be average or slightly overweight and are very adept at hiding their disorder.

Bulimics are concerned about their body shape and can be very narcisstic. She added, "A lot of times this will be the girl that people will say (about), 'Oh, she thinks she's it."

There are chemicals in the body that are responsible for modulating mood and appetite and Giaquinto said "the bulimic is basically using this to create changes in her mood."

One young woman who suffers from bulimia explained, "I'm so lonely it's pathetic ... I have this void inside of me and I binge thinking it will make it better, but it doesn't."

Giaquinto also explained some of the eating rituals that eating disorder victims have. Anorexics may spend hours eating a meal that a healthy person would eat in 15 minutes. "They'll break a corn muffin into 100 pieces and eat every one with a fork."

One young woman who is presently being treated for an eating disorder talked about her eating patterns, saying, "I don't think I'll ever be normal about food. I'm going to have to take somebody else's idea of what's normal and use it for myself ... I have no idea."

Giaquinto added that some people with eating disorders will shut down emotionally because of physical or sexual abuse they have suffered. "We find that as many as one in three of the girls in the unit have been abused ... A lot of times they feel that they were responsible and in order to get out these feelings they might be involved in excessive exercising or purging."

In addition to the emotional problems associated with eating disorder victims, they also suffer physical health complications. Anorexics have very slow pulses, sometimes in the 30s and 40s; most people's pulses are 60 to 80 with the average being 70. They are also at high risk for heart failure. Drastic dieting causes muscles to shrink, and the heart, which is a muscle, actually becomes smaller. Additionally, anorexics suffer from low body temperature, low blood pressure and low blood sugar.

When the condition becomes severe, the skin turns a yellowish or grayish color and fine, downy hair may appear on the body. "This is really the body's last attempt to keep itself warm," said Giaquinto.

Bulimics may have swollen glands in their neck from vomiting. They can also suffer from constipation, ulcers and dental problems caused by the acid from vomiting working away at their teeth enamel. Giaquinto added that sometimes dentists are the first ones to discover that a person is bulimic.

Bulimics are also at risk of heart failure. Some take syrup of ipecac to induce vomiting. A cardiotoxin that gets built up in the heart tissue, syrup of ipecac can eventually cause heart failure, as it did in Karen Carpenter.

The eating disorders unit at the St. Clares-Riverside Medical Center provides a four to six week inpatient program, along with other types of programs. It is a behavior modification plan which includes nutritional counseling therapy. Their emergency hotline number is 201-625-0288 and is manned 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Confessions of a teen bulimic

By JACQUELINE GENTILE
Assistant Features Editor

The following is a factual account of a bulimic teenager. Her name has been changed to ensure personal privacy.

Mary is 16. She is attractive. She is friendly. She has also suffered from an eating disorder.

Mary was bulimic for a year and a half before being admitted to the North Jersey Center for Eating Disorders, where her stay lasted for six weeks and two days.

For a few months she was able to hide her eating disorder from her parents and friends. But she explained, "One night, I was in my bathroom and my mother heard me purging. She came up and knocked on the door ... I finally had to let her in. She saw me purging and said 'This isn't normal.' I told her 'I don't know what you're talking about.' "

Although she denied it at first, Mary finally broke down and admitted she had a problem. She mentioned several factors that contributed to the onset of her eating disorder: sexual abuse, competition and jealousy between her and her mother, and her inability to deal with conflict. She added, "I couldn't accept myself for who I was ... I didn't love myself."

Five feet, four inches tall and 125 pounds before she became bulimic, Mary's weight dropped to an anorexic level. At her lowest weight she was 88 pounds. Every day she would step on the scale, hoping for it to read a pound less. She thought that five pounds would be even better because then she felt she would be able to eat whatever she wanted and not worry about gaining weight, "but it would never get to a stopping point," she added.

> I could have died. I could have lost my teeth. . .Nothing mattered except being thin.
> — Mary, an anorexic

"I always thought a thinner person was a better person ... If I couldn't be the most beautiful or the smartest or the most liked ... I could always be the thinnest."

Mary was aware, however, of the effects bulimia could have on her body. She said that when she had a report to do for school she would choose the topic of eating disorders. "I knew that it was dangerous ... but it didn't matter. I could have died. I could have lost my teeth ... Nothing mattered except being thin."

She stated that her binging and purging episodes often occurred when she felt lonely and frustrated. She and her boyfriend could spend a great day together, but afterwards she said that it was possible to come home and binge and purge, "because at that moment you're scared to be alone."

> "Learn to admit you have a problem, look for support and try to get help, because it's slow suicide."
> — Mary, an anorexic

Mary emphasized the fact that in our society food is often related to affection. For example, parents might reward a well-behaved child with a snack, or send a naughty child to bed without supper. She used this as a comparison to bulimics. "There is a hole inside ... The person is missing the love and affection they're looking for, Bulimics look for food to fill the hole. When they're not filling that hole they tend to purge to get rid of frustrations. It's a cycle ... The hole isn't filled."

After going through the inpatient program at the North Jersey Center for Eating Disorders, Mary says she is now more in touch with her feelings. But she added, "I still don't like to eat in front of anyone."

When asked how she feels about the possibility of slipping back into her old eating patterns, she answers, "I'm very afraid."

Mary said that if she could give advice to people who suffer from an eating disorder she would tell them to "learn to admit they have a problem, look for support and try to get help, because it's slow suicide."

This Test Could Improve Your LIFE. Or SAVE IT.

To determine if you or someone you know is suffering from an eating disorder, take the self-test below.

	Never	Sometimes	Often	Always
1. Is your life a series of constant diets?
2. Do you vomit, take laxatives or diuretics to control your weight?
3. Do you have alternate periods of eating binges and fasts to control your weight?
4. Does your weight fluctuate by as much as 10 pounds because of your eating habits?
5. Have you ever had a "food binge" during which you ate a large amount of food in a short period of time?
6. If you "binged" was it on high-calorie food, such as ice cream, candy, cookies, cake?
7. Have you ever stopped a binge by vomiting, sleeping or by experiencing pain?
8. Do you think your eating habits are abnormal?

Vampires strike

The Queen of the Damned
By Anne Rice
Knopf Publishing

Anne Rice's "Chronicles of the Vampires" continue with her latest novel of the undead, The Queen of the Damned.

Ever since the publication of Interview with the Vampire in 1976, Anne Rice has been the uncrowned queen of the vampire legend, remaking the ancient creature passed down over the years from Bram Stoker to Bela Lugosi into her own macabre, yet modern creation. The Vampire Lestat, the second of the chronicles, was published in 1985 and firmly established Rice as one of the best in the horror field. With this third installment, Rice's work truly becomes an institution in the horror genre.

The Queen of the Damned picks up just before where her last novel ended. Lestat, the self-professed "James Bond of Vampires," has embarked on a career as a rock star and plans to reveal his true nature at a concert in San Francisco. Vampires around the world flock to the concert, some to join Lestat in his mission, others to destroy him and keep their existence a secret from mankind.

As the tension builds to the concert date, some mysterious force is destroying the vampires around the world. This force is later revealed as Akasha, the Queen of the Damned, the Egyptian queen who became the original vampire when she received the curse many centuries ago.

Lestat's music has awakened Akasha from her dormant state of thousands of years. She rises to shape the modern world of humans into her own twisted utopia, but first seeks Lestat to claim him as her prince in order that they may rule the world together.

All the world becomes a battleground as the vampires seek to destroy Akasha, knowing that to destroy her, the source of all vampires, they will destroy themselves.

Into the conflict comes the ancient "legend of the twins" and a prophecy left unfulfilled since the days of ancient Egypt that holds dire consequences for Akasha and her vision.

Rice fills this battlefield of the night with many of the characters from her previous books and also creates new vampires for this tale.

Aside from Lestat, she brings back Louis, the compassionate vampiric narrator of her first novel and Armand, the youthfully handsome vampire with the wisdom of hundreds of years, along with many others. Rice also evokes the memory of Claudia, the child vampire destroyed in the first novel that Rice patterned after her own daughter, Michelle, who died of leukemia at 6.

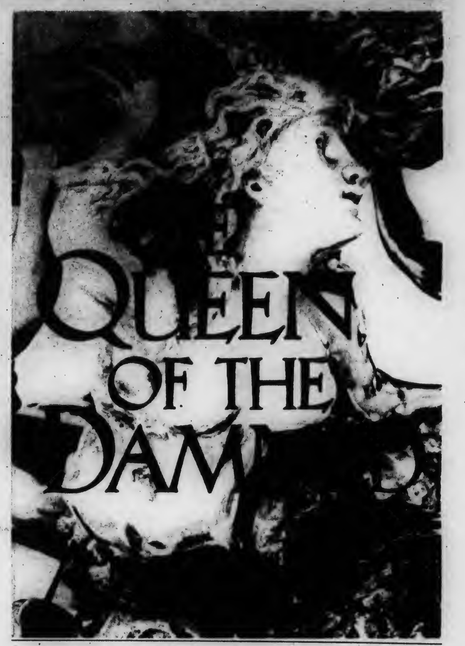
Rice introduces new vampires as diversified as Baby Jenks, a runaway girl "adopted" by a rogue gang of vampires. The reader also meets Khayman, an ancient Egyptian vampire as old as the great queen and nearly as powerful, amongst many others.

Unlike the vampires of lore who cast no reflection because they lacked a soul, Rice's vampires are souled creatures who reflect many of the doubts and fears of men in their timeless state. It is one of Rice's central ironies that as her humans long to be immortal, her immortals often long to be human once again and to be able to feel alive in the fullest sense with all of life's uncertainties.

Rice blends religion, erotica, her own black sense of humor and her incredible capacity to create her personal vampiric fable to form a vampire world that is as beautiful as it is horrific in its timeless amorality. Rice's vampires know no good or evil. They only know the value of life, whether mortal or immortal.

Because this is the third installment, it would be advisable to read at least one of the previous books first. Rice tries to keep each book as self-explanatory as possible, but cannot possibly recapture every nuance she has formed over the years.

For those who have yet to read Anne Rice, The Queen of the Damned is a fine introduction to her fascinating tales of the vampires. For those who have read her before, this novel will add to your appreciation of her and leave you thirsting for the next novel. "The Vampire Chronicles," she adds on the final page, "will continue" to the delight of all her fans.



Music Television satirized in "Tapeheads"

By BILL ECKENRODE
Staff Reporter

"Tapeheads"
Directed by Bill Fishman
Avenue Pictures

"Where's Mike Nesmith?" For those who have spent countless hours watching old Monkees reruns on MTV, that question can now be answered with the opening of "Tapeheads," a movie that stars John Cusack and Tim Robbins, with Nesmith as the executive producer.

In addition, it features actresses Mary Crosby and Connie Stevens, as well as actors Don Cornelius, better known as the host of TV's "Soul Train" and Lyle Alzado, former football tough guy and star of Hanes underwear advertisements. Short cameo appearances are made by "Weird" Al Yankovic and Bob Goldthwait, as well as the former head man of the Dead Kennedys, Jello Biafra, who is cast very much against type as an FBI agent.

For those of us who have become disgusted with MTV, however, "Tapeheads" is an original, side-splitting comedy that spoofs the seeming insistance on image over substance, cool over classic, and savvy over soul in today's music, and does a superb job of satirizing all aspects of life and politics in the so-called "MTV" generation.

"Tapeheads" follows the trials and tribulations of two fun-loving childhood buddies; Josh Tager, 'Robbins,' an intelligent, sensitive musician, and Ivan Alexeev, 'Cusack,' who is the prototypical scheming entrepreneur. They are brought together by a devotion to a soul duo known as the "Swanky Modes," who are actually real life soul stars Sam Moore and Junior Walker.

The comedy gets off to an explosive and hilarious start when Josh and Ivan decide to give up their jobs to become music video producers. They attempt to support their fledgling company by videotaping living wills, conducting "dog seances," and directing fast food commercials and "T and A" videos for Swedish rock bands. On their way up the ladder of the video industry, they come in contact with every type of mogul, wanna-be, has-been and hanger-on.

While the satirical humor does keep the viewer laughing, it is Robbins' and Cusack's portrayal of Josh and Ivan's friendship that keeps the movie going. As they struggle for a chance to display their "talents," a series of unusual and hilarious happenings involving the exploding death of a heavy metal singer, a sabotaged Menudo concert and a sensational political sex scandal propel them to video fame and fortune as the modern day version of their idols, the Swanky Modes.

All of the humor in "Tapeheads" has a sharp edge to it — it was interesting to note that not many scenes in the movie went by without a television set in them — something indicative of our society that "Tapeheads" was attempting to satire. Coordinating the musical score for the movie was Nigel Harrison, best known for his bass work with the now defunct group Blondie. Major musical contributions were made by the anarchistic punk group the Dead Kennedys and veteran blues/rock man Bo Diddley.

While "Tapeheads" might not win any Academy Awards, viewers of the film will find its satirical humor incredibly funny and moving. As a "homage" to, and a satire of a world formed by the music video, "Tapeheads" is a movie well worth seeing.

Jimmy Page, foremost lead guitarist of Led Zeppelin, brought his Outrider tour to the Spectrum on Oct. 30.

By NICK MAGALIO
Staff Reporter

Jimmy Page and his Outrider tour hit Philadelphia's Spectrum this past Sunday and the former lead guitarist of the supergroup Led Zeppelin definitely proved that the "Song Still does Remain the Same."

Mason Ruffner from Texas opened for Page and proved to be an exciting change of pace from the usual "boo them off the stage" opening band. This three-piece band played much like the Jimi Hendrix Experience, and the crowd enjoyed their performance. His sound can be likened to that of Lynyrd Skynrd.

Some of the songs that brought a great deal of crowd response were "At it Again," "Gypsy Blood" and "Dancin' on Top of the World." Ruffner also played a number of uplifting solos and really "showboated" his talent by playing with his mouch and behind his back.

All in all, Mason Ruffner proved to be an exciting opening act and should become more popular as he gets more airplay on the radio waves.

But the crowd was there to see one man and one man only, Jimmy Page. The arena was full of "Led Heads" who anticipated nothing but the best from their former lead man. Shirts, banners and patches, among other things, generated a Led Zeppelin aura around the Spectrum before the legend finally took the stage. And the place went completely nuts.

The crowd rose to their feet as Page entranced his audience with a slow "bluesy" solo. The crowd expected that a smattering of Led Zep would be played, and Jimmy did not let them down when he pulled out the acoustic for a stirring version of "Over the Hills and Far Away."

After his blast from the past, Page went to his latest release and chose the instrumentals "Liquid Mercury" and "Writes of Winter," and sandwiched them around "Wanna Make Love." The crowd was not into it as much as the Zep, but immediately got pumped when Page broke into "Tear Down the Walls" from his days with The Firm.

Many critics thought that Page could not perform without the services of Robert Plant but his replacement, John Miles, handled himself admirably.

Gunslinger hits the mark

The Dark Tower: The Gunslinger
By Stephen King
Plume Books

If you are familiar with the writing style of Steven King, you have become accustomed to his masterful use of horror and gore. He is world famous for his graphic descriptions and incredible endings. However, in The Dark Tower: The Gunslinger, King demonstrates a different side of his enormous talents. Throughout the novel, the reader is forced to constantly stay with the action and use his own judgments and interpretations.

For the first time, King does not create a spectacular ending because The Gunslinger is only the first novel in the epic series of "The Dark Tower." Although he has not completed the series, King feels that the entire story is presently somewhere deep within himself. He is now working on The Dark Tower; The Drawing of the Three, which will be appearing in bookstores around the United States in March 1989.

The Gunslinger is a novel based on the travels of Roland, who has the distinction of being the last living gunslinger. He is on a quest to catch the elusive Black Man in order to gain access into The Dark Tower. However, many obstacles are placed in his path as he fights nature and the supernatural to keep his hopes alive.

He has shown the rest of the literary world that he is capable of writing a "thinking man's novel," as well as the suspenseful horror novels for which he is famous.

During this journey, Roland is helped by a sex-starved bar owner and a bewildered young boy from the planet Earth. He also experiences many flashbacks about his youth, when the world was still a desirable place in which to live. These are valuable because they allow the reader to see the inside of Roland, as well as his rugged exterior.

Many parts of this novel are extremely confusing and need personal interpretation in order to be given a definition. It would seem that Roland personifies the remaining good in the world while the Dark Man is probably one of Satan's many henchmen. One fact that is difficult to determine is where all of this action is taking place. There are endless possibilities and that is part of the intrigue of this novel.

By writing The Dark Tower: The Gunslinger, Steven King has elevated himself to a higher plateau of writing. He has shown the rest of the literary world that he is capable of writing a "thinking man's novel," as well as the suspenseful horror novels for which he is famous. Statements like, "Only enemies speak the truth. Friends and lovers lie endlessly, caught in the web of duty," contain a great deal of truth and really make you think. Anyone who reads this will be anxiously awaiting the second segment of this epic series. And they should be.

Jimmy Page brings musical history to the Spectrum

also for an awesome version of "Midnight Moonlight" from the Firm's self-titled album. The crowd was obviously moved by Page's display of talent.

Spirits rose when Page drove into the instrumental "Black Mountain Side" off Led Zeppelin I, which led into "In My Time of Dying" off the Physical Graffiti double album. Page then handed center stage to drummer Jason Bonham, the son of Led Zeppelin's late drummer, John Henry Bonham.

Bonham got the beat going with his solo that included an electric drum set near the front of the stage. This drum solo powered its way into the Firm's "Someone to Love" and "Prison Blues" from the Outrider cut.

Page quieted the audience to announce the playing of an instrumental called "Chase." No one knew what to expect from this unheard-of song, but the crowd went wild when Jimmy pulled out "The Bow." He used this violin bow to reenact the electrifying performance of his live version of "Dazed and Confused" from Led Zeppelin I.

The next two songs were "Wastin' My Time" and "Blues Anthem" from the Outrider album. The finale of the show was "Custard Pie" off the Physical Graffiti album and it included a few riffs from "Black Dog" on the untitled fourth album of Led Zeppelin.

Page jokingly asked the crowd if they remembered "this old song" and when he started jamming "Stairway to Heaven," the arena erupted!

The four-piece band came on for two encores in which the first was "Train Kept-A-Rollin' " and when he started jamming "Stairway to Heaven," the arena erupted! It was a fitting end to an awesome display of electric guitar mastery.

For those who thought the Jimmy Page had lost a step since his wild days with Led Zeppelin, try to catch his Outrider show and you will see that no one has been able to match the distinct sound of the living legend from the United Kingdom.

"Tattinger's" is great

By STEPHEN POWERS
Staff Reporter

LIGHTS!
CAMERA!
ACTION!

It has been over a month since the new television season officially started, and the networks are still rolling their new series.

TATTINGER'S (Wednesdays, 10 p.m., NBC): From the producers of the legendary "St. Elsewhere" comes this, possibly the best, and certainly the most original, new show of the year. Stephen Collins stars as Nick Tattinger, the owner of an elegant Manhattan restaurant that caters to the upper class. Blythe Danner is his ex-wife, whom Nick still loves, four years after their divorce.

The opener tells us what happened to Nick last spring: he was shot by a drug dealer, made arrangements to sell half of his restaurant and went to Paris with his young girlfriend to recuperate. He returns to New York for his daughter's debutante ball and finds his business going down the tubes because of mismanagement by his new partner. In one hour, Nick manages to save the business, outwit a crime boss who wants to raze Tattinger's to build an office complex, avoid his drug-dealing assailant (who will be a recurring character) and even make it to his daughter's party.

The best thing "Tattinger's" has going for it is its unpredictability and sense of humor. Although, given the numerous possibilities, it is unclear exactly what this show is going to be about, it should be worth going along for the ride. Collins does well during the comedic portions of the program, and while he is not a great dramatic actor, he is appealing enough to carry it off. The romantic tension between him and Danner puts Dave and Maddie to shame.

The producers have a great time poking fun at high society, especially Nick's daughters, Nina and Winifred (Patrice Colihan and Chay Lentin), who must be the most obnoxious teens on television. Maybe we will get lucky, and instead of trying to bump off Nick, the drug dealer will go after these two instead.

ANNIE McGUIRE (Wednesdays, 8:30 p.m., CBS): Give Mary Tyler Moore and her producers credit for trying to do something different. Moore's third sitcom is not a typical situation comedy; it has no laugh track and lacks the wisecracking teenagers that populate virtually every other show on the air. Instead, this is a warm, upbeat series that focuses on adults.

Moore plays a divorcee with a son, who marries a widower (Denis Arndt) with a son and daughter. Annie/Mary is the director of community relations for Manhattan, while her husband, Nick, is a blue collar-type who works in construction. Their children, who supposedly do not get along, are thankfully relegated to little more than cameo roles.

Moore is still as perky as ever, and she has a way of making even the worst lines seem funny. She and Arndt (who was excellent in the few scenes he had in the premiere) have good chemistry and seem like they have been working together for a long time. John Randolph, as Nick's arch-conservative father, appeared only briefly in the first episode, and Eileen Heckart, who plays Annie/Mary's liberal mother, did not appear at all.

"Annie McGuire" shows a lot of potential and has just one minor problem (two, if you count its rotten time slot): it is difficult to get used to hearing Moore called "Annie." Maybe they could rename the show "Mary McGuire."

DEAR JOHN (Thursdays, 9:30 p.m., NBC): Sandwiched between the successful "Cheers" and "L.A. Law," this sitcom is sure to be a hit. Judd Hirsch plays John, a New York city school-teacher whose wife leaves him for his best friend, and then kicks him out of their house. He takes an apartment in the city and joins a therapy group, filled with assorted oddballs, at the local community center.

The premise is weak, and this show suffers from an incredibly bland supporting cast of characters.

The premise is weak, and this show suffers from an incredibly bland supporting cast of characters. The standout is supposed to be Jere Burns, who plays the ignorant, conceited Kirk, but his character is so one-dimensional that it is difficult to care about him. The same thing goes for Ralph, the whining geek played by Harry Groener. Isabella Hoffman as Kate, who is destined to be John's love interest, is so dull that she is practically invisible.

Contrived as it may be, "Dear John" still has some fairly funny jokes and, given the fact that it is from the same people who produced "Taxi," Hirsch's last series, it will most likely improve.

The Feelies find success

By BILL CARR AND MICHAEL AIMETTE
Staff Reporters

FOR WHAT IT'S WORTH

Frenzied acoustic strumming complementing sparse electric fills ... two precussionists adding to the frenetic musical attack ... repetitive chords and droning vocals forming songs of an almost hypnotic nature ... These are phrases describing The Feelies' music, a unique sound that leads to "more of a subconscious listening experience," according to their guitarist Bill Million.

Only Life is the title of the Hoboken, N.J.-based band's third, and best album. The interesting part about The Feelies is that they rarely compose truly outstanding songs; rather, their albums are a succession of good songs that fit perfectly together. Though some may find the dense sound somewhat boring, those who like the band eventually become avid fans.

Filmmaker Johnathon Demme certainly is; he persuaded the band to let him direct their first video, "Away," and used another song from Only Life, ("Too Far Gone") in his film "Married To The Mob." He curiously reviewed the album as sounding "best at dawn after no sleep, driving in a convertible past trees and small homes." Though this scenario may be difficult to envision, it perfectly illustrates The Feelies' unique and altogether enjoyable brand of music.

The interesting part about The Feelies is that they rarely compose truly outstanding songgs; rather their albums are a succession of good songs that fit perfectly together.

BRICKELL & BOHEMIANS: The sixties are hip again. If the "hippie" attitudes of the sixties have not been inherited by this generation, one can at least notice a resurgence of tie-dye shirts and female folk artists. This neo-folk trend is kept in motion by Edie Brickell & New Bohemians on their debut album for Geffen Records, Shooting Rubberbands At The Stars.

Admittedly, this is not a band everyone is talking about, but give Edie Brickell some time. If the decidely Boho flavor of 10,000 Maniacs caught on, then it would be hard to imagine the same audience overlooking Edie Brickell & New Bohemians.

One of the things one notices first about the album is that some of the songs were written as far back as 1985. (This means Edie Brickell has been trying very hard. And the effort shows.) Simply put, this is one of the best recordings of the year, hippie or otherwise. The dense, often beautiful instrumentation perfectly coheres with Brickell's virtuoso singing to create songs of varying tempo and mood. Brickell sounds like a lot of people, namely Rikki Lee Jones; but at this stage in rock music it seem virtually impossible for any new artist not to sound like somebody. Edie Brickell & New Bohemians will be playing at the Theatre of the Living Arts in the near future. Exact date to come.

SHORT STUFF: Five rock and roll legends, Roy Orbison, Tom Petty, Jeff Lynne, George Harrison and Bob Dylan collaborated to forn The Traveling Wilburys. Judging from their first single, "Handle With Care," from their first album Volume One, this supergroup seems interested in having a good time — happy songs containing none of the pretentions or ego one might expect. ...

Long Time Gone is the title of the new book by David Crosby; an autobiography graphically depicting his longtime drug addiction and eventual rehabilitation. On a related note, the much-anticipated Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young reunion is now a reality. American Dream is the title of the new album, their first since 1974. Unfortunately, due to other obligations, CSNY will not tour ...

Bryan Ferry has a greatest hits collection due out in December. The album is modestly entitled The Ultimate Collection ...

Record Roundup. . .Lennon, Edie Brickell

By ANDREW MATHIS
Staff Reporter

Imagine: John Lennon
Motion Picture Soundtrack
Capitol Records
★★★½

With all the bad publicity that John Lennon has been getting lately through Albert Goldman's pseudo-biography The Lives of John Lennon, it is nice that a film such as "Imagine — John Lennon" can be released and clear everyone's view of the musical legend. Along with the release of this film comes a double-album soundtrack containing vintage Beatles and Lennon solo material, as well as some previously-unreleased material and rarities.

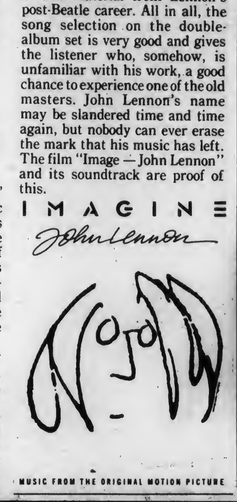
The song is absolutely heart-wrenching as Lennon laments the loss of his mother and father before reaching adulthood.

The opening track, "Real Love" is a previously unreleased acoustic tune reminiscent of Lennon's work around the time of the Beatles' White Album. The rest of the first album contains Lennon's best work with the Beatles including "A Day in the Life" and "Revolution," as well as the classic anti-war anthem "Give Peace a Chance."

The second album is clearly more interesting. Included are a rehearsal track of "Imagine," as well as the version from the album of the same name. Also on the second album is a live version of "Mother," the result of Lennon's primal-scream therapy in the early '70s. The song is absolutely heart-wrenching as Lennon laments the loss of his mother and father before reaching adulthood. It is confusing, however, that Lennon would choose to perform this song during one of his few live appearances. While the version presented on this album is interesting, the studio version is more highly recommended.

"Jealous Guy" is a track from the second album that is indicative of the latest part of Lennon's career. Most likely an outtake from Double Fantasy, it is now being played with a video on MTV. Lennon's own interpretation of the '50s classic "Stand By Me" is also available in this package.

The rest of the second album is solo material from Lennon's post-Beatle career. All in all, the song selection on the double-album set is very good and gives the listener who, somehow, is unfamiliar with his work, a good chance to experience one of the old masters. John Lennon's name may be slandered time and time again, but nobody can ever erase the mark that his music has left. The film "Image — John Lennon" and its soundtrack are proof of this.



Shooting Rubber Bands at the Stars
Eddie Brickell and the New Bohemians
Geffen Records
★★½

Edie Brickell and the New Bohemians are a band following a recent but very successful trend in the music business. Like Suzanne Vega, Michelle Shocked and 10,000 Maniacs, the New Bohemians combine folk-based music with the lyrics and singing of a strong female presence. The result of Edie Brickell's first collaboration with the Texas-based New Bohemians is Shooting Rubber Bands at the Stars, which, although containing good musicianship and singing, only has a few really bright spots.

The opening track, "What I Am," and "She," a song from the second side, are really the only outstanding trcks on the album. While the singing and guitar work supplied by Kenny Winthrow are good in every song, not to mention Brickell's lyric writing, most of the album tends to run together, and towrd the end, it really begins to drag.

While Edie Brickell and the New Bohemians are obviously a band with potential, they still have to develop further in the effective combination of their words and music. Only time will tell if they are good enough to survive after the great female singer revival of the '80s is past.

Ruggers rampage

By JOHN R. LEARY
and CARLOS DiNOTA
Staff Reporters

For the second year in a row, the Villanova Ruggers are the Eastern Pennsylvania Rugby Conference champions. They defeated Lehigh in the collegiate finals held Oct. 30 at Fairmount Park, after beating Bucknell at home in a semifinal match on Oct. 29.

The Ruggers finished their fall league schedule at 7—0, and certainly maintained, if not improved upon, their No. 10 ranking on the East Coast.

Coming into last weekend, Bucknell and Lehigh shared first place in Division B of the Eastern Pennsylvania Conference, with both clubs playing to a scoreless tie the weekend before. Villanova, the top team in Division A, was therefore well aware that Bucknell would be no pushover.

'Nova proved to the skeptics at Saturday's semifinal that their success this year was attributable to an extremely talented, well-conditioned ball club, and not the result of weak competition. Though Bucknell held a clear size advantage over 'Nova, the Ruggers stuck to their game plan for 80 minutes.

The backs were relentless, penetrating Bucknell's defense with ten-meter spurts on each play. Hooker Dan O'Mara capitalized off one of the many exceptional backfield drives, scooping a loose ball and running in for 'Nova's first points.

Flyhalf Mike Koons soon followed with a 25-meter drop-kick to send Villanova into halftime with a 7—0 lead.

Villanova's excellent open-field tackling and swarming defense held Bucknell to only a penalty kick for the entire game. Scrumhalf Tom Jadico caught the opposition with their backs turned as they were retreating after a penalty, and dashed five meters for 'Nova's third score.

Koons followed minutes later with a 10-meter run up the middle to seal 'Nova's semifinal victory at 17—3.

The Ruggers travelled to Fairmount Park the following day to challenge Lehigh for the Eastern Pennsylvania Championship. 'Nova, though battered and bruised, played with tremendous intensity and defeated a physical opponent 6—0.

Koons supplied all the day's scoring with a penalty kick and his sixth drop-kick in six straight games. 'Nova's defense was tenacious, holding Lehigh in their own half of the field for most of the match.

The championship win was by far the sweetest victory for the Ruggers this season. Villanova now automatically qualifies for the 64-team single-elimination National Rugby Tournament to be held in the spring.

Women impressive in crew regatta

By MAUREEN STAPLETON
Staff Reporter

The women's crew team rowed to spectacular finishes in the Thomas Eakins Head of the Schuylkill Regatta on Oct. 29. The novice A boat finished third in a field of 14 boats with a time of 17:15. The varsity team finished ninth in a field of 31 boats in 16:11.

Chad Deavers, varsity coach, said it was an "outstanding performance" which consisted of "high caliber racing."

The novice A boat finished ahead of all other Philadelphia boats in the race, but behind Princeton A and Syracuse. The boat was able to pass the Penn A boat in the final leg of the race for a victory over them.

Head races in crew are different from sprint races; the other type of rowing race. The boats are started one at a time 15 seconds apart. The race is primarily against the clock, but crews also attempt to overtake the crew which is racing in front of them. Once the crew has caught the other, it is assured placing ahead of them because of the 15-second deficit at the beginning of the race.

The varsity women raced in a field of 40 boats. The race was won by the Princeton A boat. The other finishers in front of Villanova were: Syracuse A, second, United States Naval Academy A, third, University Of Massachusetts, fourth, University of Pennsylvania A, fifth, Columbia, sixth, Princeton B, seventh, and Colgate, eighth.

The Head of the Schuylkill is rowed over a two and three-quarter mile course on the Schuylkill River in Philadelphia. The regatta began in 1971 with 100 rowers and has grown to over 2,000 rowers in 1988.

The regatta attracts rowers from across the country. The events include both colegiate and club teams.

The next races for the women's team will be on Nov. 19 and 20. On Nov. 19 they will compete in the Frostbite regatta, and on Nov. 20 they will be in the Braxton regatta. Both events will be held in Philadelphia on the Schuylkill.

Swimmers ready for season

By NANCY CUTTITA
Staff Reporter

The 1988-89 women's swimming team season opens with a double-dual meet Nov. 5 against Georgetown. The team looks to the opening of their season with enthusiasm and optimism. If the Wildcats compete as well as their previous season, womens' swimming should give a very strong showing this year.

The 1987-88 season terminated with a respectable five wins and three losses. The Cats also managed to place second in the Big East Championships and third in the Eastern Championships.

Head Coach Chuck Horton proudly boasted of the Cats Big East swimmer, Laurel Fournier, who competed in sprints, "We are very proud of Laurel's performance and hope to do as well this season."

According to Horton, the team exemplifies good leadership, especially shown by senior swimmers Mary Mayfield, Terri Messenger and Megan Waters.

He also feels the team's younger members will contribute. "Our freshmen swimmers are a great asset to the team and should definitely enhance our performance," said Horton.

Two key swimmers who are doing remarkably well are Christy Bridgewater, swimming back stroke and freestyle, and Eileen Consadine, swimming sprints. Also improving every day with practice is Katie Lehmann, swimming sprint butterfly.

Looking to the opening season, the team appears prepared and ready to successfully meet in Hawaii on Dec. 30, however, until then, the Cats face a demanding schedule. With such strong team leadership, a confident coach, and continuing improvement, the womens' swimming team already seems to be on the road to a promising season.

"I am very proud to be the coach of the winner of this award and the first Villanovan to win this award," Stern said. "The Jumbo Elliott award is a huge honor. It is the Heisman trophy of track, or the Heisman is the Jumbo Elliott award of football."

Like Huber, Young is a phenomenal runner. The 1988 graduate of UCLA dominated the 400-meter run in his senior season, while claiming fourth in that race in the Olympics last September. While Young was running for UCLA, the Bruins managed to capture two national titles.

"When people think of Jumbo Elliott, they think of winning and hard work. That's what Jumbo Elliott symbolized and that is why I am very happy to win the award," Young said.

Perhaps the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, summed everything up perfectly when he said, "Jumbo Elliott is a symbol of striving for excellence. Vicki Huber is also that symbol — an excellent student, athlete and person. After talking to Kevin [Young], I feel the same way about him."

Men's crew races impressively

By JIM BOWMAN
Features Editor

In September, the Villanova men's crew team managed to raise a few eye brows in the rowing world with an impressive victory at the Head of the Ohio regatta.

After their most recent performances, no one can take their eyes off the Cats.

On Oct. 23, at the world-famous Head of the Charles in Boston, Mass., the Villanova men's varsity lightweight eight boat captured a remarkable 14th place in the 42-boat international field. A mere 13 seconds separated the third through 14th-place finishers.

Even more significant was the fact that they were the highest Dad Vail finisher in the race. The Cats crushed rival Georgetown and the nearest Dad Vail finisher placed 19th.

The next week, at the Head of the Schulykill, on Oct. 29, the Cats added insult to injury as their lightweights raced in the heavyweight field and defeated the Hoyas' heavyweights, en route to an impressive 17th-place finish in the 54-boat field. Their time of 13:50 was their fastest 2¾-mile race of the season.

According to sophomore oarsman Bill McKernan, the team's success has come through leadership and dedication. "There is no way this boat and this program would be this good without (seniors) Al Stefan, Joe Barrow and Victor Gallik," he said. "Those guys have dedicated their lives to this for four years, and now all that sweat is finally paying off."

Junior coxswain Gerry Gleeson believes it comes down to one thing: hard work. "The leadership of Al (Stefan), Joe (Barrow), Victor (Gallik) and Phil Faranda has been incredible, but it has been a complete team effort. Right now, this is the hardest working boat I've ever been in. They give a 110 percent every day," said Gleeson.

Members of Villanova's lightweight boat are: bow, Greg Doyle; two, Dennis Chiapetta; three, Gallik; four, Greg Stefan; five, Gary Zigmund; six, Barrow; seven, Al Stefan; stroke, Bill McKernan; and coxswain, Gleeson.

One of the major surprises at the Head of the Schuylkill was the success of 'Nova's heavyweight four boat, which finished seventh out of 40, despite working together for only a week. Members of this boat include Margaret Delp, cox; Rich Burda, stroke; Brian Varga, three; Chris Perry, two; and Pat Hayden, bow.

A vocal Villanova cheering contingent witnessed both races, a fact not unnoticed by the Wildcat rowers. "The fan support was great. It's a great feeling to hear 'Nova fans screaming us on. It's a big help," added McKernan.

The fall season is now finished, but the Wildcat oarsmen continue working out daily under the direction of Head Coach Jack St. Claire, in preparation for what could be a blockbuster spring season.

Womens' volleyball

By MONICA BYRNE
Staff Reporter

The women's volleyball team played its only game last week on Oct. 25, and suffered a "temporary setback" according to Head Coach David Barkley.

The Cats traveled to Fairleigh Dickinson to play a match in which they "made a lot of unforced errors." 'Nova lost in four games (11-15, 15-12, 12-15, 8-15).

Coach Barkley said that the loss was definitely a "team effort," due to the fact that 'Nova was just "not mentally sharp." He believes that the "big test (of the team's direction) will depend on how well we play next time."

After facing Seton Hall for the third time on Nov. 4 'Nova will host Georgetown Nov. 5 at 2 p.m. in the Jake Nevin Field House. The Cats are "still working hard at practice and are looking good," so Barkley is not overly concerned about his team's latest defeat.

Athlete of the Week

KIRK SCHULZ

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is Villanova's junior quarterback Kirk Schulz.

Schulz completed 21 of 26 passes while leading Villanova's football team to a 45-6 win over Richmond. The junior also threw for 301 yards and four touchdown passes. One of the scoring strikes came on a 47-yard pass to Wildcat tailback Jeff Dingle.

In addition, Schulz, who is from Mahwah, New Jersey, was named ECAC Division 1-AA Offensive player of the week, marking the first time a Villanova athlete collected such an honor.

Schulz was also named Yankee Conference Offensive player of the week for his performance against Richmond.

Men's soccer post-season expectations end abruptly

By JOE GUARINO
Staff Reporter

After losing two straight 1-0 heartbreakers, the Villanova men's soccer team found itself with a record of 6-9-1, with one game remaining. Their hopes for a berth in the post-season Big East tournament were extinguished by these crushing defeats.

Late second-half goals led to the Wildcat's demise. On Oct. 26, the Philadelphia School of Pharmacy and Science visited Villanova Stadium for the final home appearance of Wildcat seniors Gary Bagin, Jim Cowan, Bill Gallagher, Jim Gregory, Ron Klos and Kevin Shuster. The Cats had not defeated the Rams in their previous eight attempts and this game would be no exception.

Although the first half ended in a scoreless tie, the tone had been set by the relentless offensive pressure of the Rams. The outstanding goaltending of senior Ron Klos had come through thus far, but the ball had rarely progressed out of the Villanova end of the field.

With the help of Cowan, Bagin, Rich Forberg and Joe Retneller, Klos was able to keep the net empty until the Ram's 6'4" 220 lb. striker Steve Starcevich scored with 12:25 remaining. The Cats fell to 6-8-1 overall and 1-3-1 in Philadelphia's Soccer 7.

The Cats traveled to the University of Pittsburgh on Oct. 29 to renew their Big East rivalry with the Panthers. Once again, the play of the Wildcat defense, led by Klos, was unparalleled. However, with a goal with 7:31 left to play in the second half, the Panthers defeated the Wildcats.

This left Villanova with a record of 1-3 in the Big East, 6-9-1 overall. The Cats will not receive a bid in the Big East post-season championships.

The Cats will face Soccer 7 foe Drexel in their season finale on Nov. 1. They have not defeated Drexel since 1982.

Swimmers rout American U.

By STEVE KIRSCH
Staff Reporter

The return from fall break also brought the return of the Wildcat men's swimming and diving team. The 1988-89 squad has high hopes for the coming season and they got off to a bright start by defeating visiting American University on Oct. 26, 143-82.

They then hosted the third annual Villanova Relay Carnival on Oct. 29, and took the team title. The 'Nova men put 104 points on the board, followed by La Salle with 92 and Army and Shippensburg with 72 apiece.

Senior Chris Craft, a local product out of Devon, claimed three victories in defeating American. Craft, freshman Jim MacKey and seniors Blaise Matthews and Tim Truax combined to open the Wildcat rout by winning the 400-meter medley relay in a time of 3:36.03. This was the start of a "shutout" for the Cats as they won each of the remaining 12 events as well.

Craft was victorious in the 200 individual medley in a time of 1:58.51. Sophomore Brian Stagg chipped in with a second-place finish in 1:59.33. Craft also won the 200 butterfly in 1:56.06 for his third first-place finish of the day.

Junior Lou Dearstyne won both the 200 freestyle and 100 freestyle events in times of 1:43.61 and 47.26, respectively. Dearstyne finished ahead of American's Chip Hector in both events.

Freshman Russ Stockman took first place in the 1000 freestyle, winning in a time of 9:50.65. 'Nova sophomore Jay Dillenschneider finished behind Stockman in 10:09.20. Stockman also won the 500 freestyle in 4:49.90.

Returning to action in hosting the Relay Carnival, Villanova's men claimed victory in the 800 freestyle relay in a meet record of 6:58.75, shattering last year's meet record by over four seconds.

The key to victory was the fact that, in spite of winning only three relay events, they took second in five of the other seven events. Those events were the 400 medley, the 200 freestyle, the 400 breaststroke, the 400 backstroke and the 400 freestyle relays.

The Wildcats, now with a tournament title and their first regular season victory under their belts, return to action on Nov. 5 when Georgetown visits. Under the direction of Coach Ed Geisz, the Cats are off to a flying start and the 1988-89 season appears to be a promising one.

Soccer drops pair

The Wildcat womens' soccer team pounced on visiting George Washington on Oct. 27, for the squad's sixth victory of the season. Freshman Betsy Clement, who leads the team in goals, netted her fifth and sixth of the season, while senior Anne Beirne capitalized on a penalty kick to wrap up the 3-0 victory for the Cats.

Dominating the offense once again, 'Nova held a sizable 17-6 advantage in shots while freshman goaltender Karen Del Sarto registered three saves en route to her fourth shutout of the season.

Needing to win at least one of their next two matches to gain an possible berth in the ECAC tournament, the Cats faced the University of New Hampshire on Oct. 29. The contest remained scoreless until midway through the second period when the opposition found the back of the net for the only goal of the game.

The impressive defense of Del Sarto, with 11 saves, kept the match close, and although the Wildcats were able to outshoot New Hampshire 17-13, they could not come away with the victory.

Clement, assisted by Tina Conti and Beth McMahon, continued to lead the Villanova offense as she put the Cats up 1-0 against host Holy Cross on Oct. 30. Comprehending the urgency of the must-win situation, Del Sarto provided another powerful showing in the goal with 15 saves, but the Crusaders managed to sneak two shots by, which led to a 2-1 'Nova defeat.

After a slow start, the Wildcats have gone 6-3-2 in their past 11 games, compiling an overall record of 6-7-4. Only one victory under .500, the squad will not be eligible to defend their ECAC championship.

'Nova football crushes Richmond

Kirk Schulz tossed four touchdown passes while completing 21 of 26 passes in last Saturday's victory over Richmond.

Following last week's 14-14 tie with William and Mary, Andy Talley, V.U.'s head football coach, remarked, "We need to go more to our passing game to get some bigger plays for us." Last Saturday, Talley showed that he is a man of his word.

The Wildcats (5-2-1) trounced the defending Yankee Conference champion Richmond Spiders (3-5) 45-6 in a game which saw the return of Villanova's explosive passing game. Quarterback Kirk Schulz burned the Spider defense for 301 yards and four touchdowns on 21 of 26 passing.

Schulz's heroics earned him offensive player of the week honors for both the Yankee Conference and the East Coast Athletic Conference, and Athlete of the Week in the Villanovan.

"Today, the reads were easy," Schulz said. "I just sat back there, relaxed, and it was there."

"Our intention this week was to try and get downfield a little more with the pass," Talley said. "We put some new patterns in this week and they worked."

Despite the large margin of victory, Villanova experienced troubles early. In fact, Richmond owned a 6-3 lead after one period.

'Nova took the opening kickoff and quickly drove 57 yards to the Richmond five. An offensive pass interference call moved them back to the 20, however, and they were forced to settle for a 37-yard field goal by Tom Withka.

The Spiders got back-to-back field goals by Rob Courter of 45 and 19 yards to take the lead.

"Even after the first drive, when we came up a little bit short with three, I knew we were going to be able to move the ball," Schulz said.

And move the ball they did.

'Nova exploded for 35 points in the next two quarters and never looked back. Schulz began the scoring barrage with a 17-yard touchdown pass to junior Bob Brady 10 minutes into the second period.

Three minutes later, halfback Jeff Dingle sprinted 30 yards off left tackle to give 'Nova a 17-6 halftime lead.

"We had some early adversity," Talley said. "But we kept our poise and some of our big guns finally went off."

The Wildcats' offense really kicked into high gear in the third quarter, scoring touchdowns all three times they had the ball. Schulz was an astouding 7-7 with three touchdown passes in the period before being relieved by junior Mike Reilly.

One of those touchdowns was a 47-yard shuffle pass to Dingle in which the halfback exemplified his break-away speed.

"The shuffle pass really showed his speed," Talley said. "He turned it on and ran past their secondary, and those are some pretty quick people."

According to Dingle, the play developed quickly. "When I got the pitch, I read my blocks and I was in the secondary before I knew it. Then I knew that it was up to them to catch me."

Freshman tailback Pat Kennedy finished off the rout with a two-yard TD plunge midway through the fourth quarter.

Cats Notes

— With the victory, the Wildcats remained one-half game back of first in the Yankee Conference behind Delaware. 'Nova is 4-1, while the Blue Hens own a 5-1 conference record.

— Villanova travels north next week to face New Hampshire (4-4) in a 1 p.m. game. "New Hampshire has one of the best defenses in the Yankee Conference," Talley said. "And with a great quarterback like Bob Jean, I'm sure we'll have a tremendous challenge on our hands."

Villanova's always potent offensive line paved the way for 227 yards rushing in the Cats 45-6 beating of Richmond.

Huber claims award

By DOUG SCANCARELLA
Sports Editor

Throughout the ages many people have been called legends. In only a few cases, however, has that term been appropriate. In the case of Villanova's former track Head Coach Jim "Jumbo" Elliott, the term certainly fits.

Elliott, who has done so much for the sport of track and field, is considered a legend for many reasons. While coaching only as a part-time occupation, Elliott headed the program for 47 years.

In those 47 years, Elliott, who died in 1981 (his final year as head man of Villanova track), led the Wildcats to eight national titles, three AAU titles and 39 IC4A titles.

Additionally, Elliott coached 32 track and field Olympians, 324 IC4A champions and 476 American record holders.

In Elliott's reign and after, many track and field stars have run for the Cats. One current star is Villanova's senior track captain Vicki Huber.

Huber, who may be headed for legendary status herself, was given the Jumbo Elliott Award last week for being the top-ranked collegiate track and field woman in 1988.

"The Jumbo Elliott award is a tribute to a man who had an incredible impact on the sport of track and field," Villanova Athletic Director Ted Aceto said. "Villanova wants to preserve Jumbo's memory in track and field.

"This award has become a prestigious award in its four years, and it is especially fitting that an award in the memory of Jumbo Elliott would honor the top collegiate track and field athlete."

The award was, in fact, given to a person who had a tremendous impact on track and field. Huber, along with UCLA standout Kevin Young, the male winner of the award, were obviously those two people in 1988.

"It is difficult for a Villanovan to receive this award because Jumbo coached here, but in the case of Vicki there was no question. She definitely did well enough to get this," Huber's Head Coach Marty Stern said.

Huber was definitely deserving. She finished sixth in the 3000-meter race at the '88 Olympics in Seoul, South Korea, and was the first American to finish. At the collegiate level Huber's career has been equally impressive. The senior owns five indoor and outdoor titles, as well as the record for the 3000-meter run with a time of 8:37.25.

"Winning this was an unbelievable feeling. All the hard work has finally paid off," Huber said. "I hope I can make Villanova prouder in the future."

Huber making Villanova prouder is certainly possible. She has the rest of her senior year to look

Wildcats collect ECAC bid

By AMY C. SPENCER
Assistant Sports Editor

For the first time since being elevated to Division I status in 1984, Wildcat field hockey has been invited to compete in post-season play. The Cats, who post a 13-6-2 record with one remaining game, received the second seed in the ECAC Tournament to be held Nov. 4-5, in Providence, R.I.

'Nova will face third seeded Dartmouth (9-4), while top-seeded Providence takes on fourth-seeded Princeton.

Head Coach Cheryl Massaro was pleased and surprised at the progress the team has made this season. "It's a pleasant surprise to be where we are because we have a young team. But they work hard together and communicate well together on and off the field and that makes the difference."

"It's the first time since we went to the Division I level that we've been selected to compete in a post-season tournament and needless to say I'm very excited. My goal as coach has been to establish that Villanova has a consistently strong team and I believe that we've begun to show the rest of the nation that we're a team to be dealt with. Our progress speaks for itself."

1988 has been a record-breaking year for 'Nova field hockey. Sharon Seiz personally rewrote the record books this season, setting new marks for season goals, season assists, season points, career goals and career points.

Her record of 22 goals thus far, eclipses the previous record by a full six goals. Sharon hit a hot streak during the season where she scored in five straight games, also a new record.

Goalkeeper Mary Monahan also had a brilliant year, breaking the career record for shutouts with nine so far this season, a total of 20 for her career. The previous record, set during 1975-77, was 14.

Monahan and Seiz were both honorable mention All-Mid Atlantic Region Team selections in 1987, and based on the numbers they have both posted this year, both have an excellent chance at being selected to the first team for 1988.

Massaro is proud of what they've accomplished this season. "It was an effort that they worked hard to achieve, and it will be extremely difficult to replace them next year."

But a new team is waiting in the wings, most likely to be led by current freshman Missy Paolantonio. Paolontonio has notched 10 assists this season, just one fewer than Seiz's record-breaking total.

Massaro commented, "Missy's a strong recruit and she's been waiting to blossom. She's going to get better every year and set all kinds of records here."

The team will conclude its season against LaSalle, a rainout from Nov., which has yet to be rescheduled.

Bush captures presidency

Sweeps South, captures Pa. and N.J.

By HALLIE ZIMMERMAN
Staff Reporter

Vice President George Bush was elected the 41st president of the United States Tuesday, by a wide margin. As of Tuesday evening Bush led Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis 399 to 132 in the electoral vote count.

Late returns Tuesday evening showed that Dukakis won six states and was leading in nine others while Bush won 26 states and was leading in nine others. Bush cleanly swept the South and also captured California.

While the margin of victory fell short of that held by President Ronald Reagan in his 1984 landslide victory over Walter Mondale, Bush did inherit a degree of Reagan's coalition, according to the New York Times.

Like Reagan, Bush did best with voters age 25-29, and managed to hang onto half of the Reagan Democrats from the 1984 campaign. Likewise, Bush did well among young professionals, veterans, farmers, and families with children, the Times said.

Bush lost support from Hispanics and union households, previously held by Reagan. Dukakis appealed to and gained the support of factory workers, feminists and working mothers. Those who consider themselves environmentalists sided with Dukakis at the polls, despite Bush's campaign to expose the pollution of the Boston Harbor, the Times explained.

A poll conducted by ABC News showed abortion to be the number one issue of the election, outranking prison furloughs and the Pledge of Allegiance. Nearly 1/3rd of the voters interviewed for the poll who cited abortion as the most prevalent issue voted for Bush.

Other important issues were the death penalty, illegal drug problems and education. Bush supporters claimed strong leadership and quality of experience as the primary characteristics they looked for, while Dukakis advocates concentrated on honesty, judgment and Dukakis' personal interest in the people, the poll stated.

Sexual harassment policy approved, implemented

By KEVIN C. HEIL
Assistant News Editor

The University has approved a sexual harassment policy and has begun implementing it, said the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, Nov. 5.

The policy, which was prepared by a University committee on sexual harassment, was submitted to the Board of Trustees Oct. 11 for approval. The board voted unanimously in favor of the proposal, Dobbin said.

Dobbin said the committee had begun its work on the policy under the administration of the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., former University president, and that Dobbin himself simply "pushed it [the policy] forward."

This [sexual harassment] is a very sensitive arena," said Dr. Mary Desmond, biology professor and member of the committee on sexual harassment. "One of the reasons we have to have a policy ... is because people aren't clear in their own minds how they treat other people," she explained.

"Most people don't think things like this [sexual harassment] even happen. There's been a significant number of events that have made it very clear that we need a policy just like the rest of the world. Villanova isn't any different than the rest of society," Desmond said.

"What people espouse to believe and ... behave, and the way they do it, isn't necessarily the same. What makes this such a delicate matter on a university campus is that there's a whole underlying principle ... among educators that everyone behave very professionally," she continued.

"The facts are that, even at Villanova, there have been incidences of the kind of harassment that is against the federal law. Now we're not talking about someone's opinion, we're talking about ... the law of this country," Desmond explained.

She said the policy "comes right out of" the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's guidelines, and that the University committee worked for "a good year, about weekly" to prepare the procedure on the policy and educate the school community about sexual harassment.

"It [the policy] is long overdue and I would hope that this will serve the purpose that we [the committee] intended it to serve, to protect those that are most vulnerable," Desmond said.

For the University's official policy on sexual harassment, see page 5.

By JENNIFER REIDY
Assistant News Editor

Forty students rallied outside the St. David's Inn in Wayne on Nov. 7 to protest the recruitment of female Villanova students by Playboy magazine for its "Women of the Big East" pictorial.

While the protestors marched outside for over an hour holding signs and shouting through a bullhorn, Playboy representatives had moved from St. David's Inn to the Adam's Mark Hotel on City Line Avenue, according to an article in the Nov. 8 issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Kenneth A. Matthews, vice president and general manager of St. David's Inn, said that to his knowledge, no Playboy representatives were interviewing prospective playmates at the hotel. "We don't permit commercialism in the guest bedrooms. They may be staying in the hotel, but they are not interviewing here," he said.

"Students Against Sexual Stereotypes [SASS] has organized this rally against Playboy's Villanova recruitment because we are offended by the negative image which Playboy and other forms of pornography present of women and of all people," according to a leaflet distributed by SASS.

Matthews' reaction to the rally was that "they are rallying to nobody ... And they are disturbing the guests in the hotel with the bullhorns and the noise."

A member of the manager's office at the Adam's Mark Hotel said that she "had no knowledge" of Playboy's presence at the hotel.

Elizabeth Norris, a spokeswoman for Playboy, said, "The hotel [St. David's Inn] apparently did not prefer that [we] hold the interviews there. David's [David Chan, a Playboy photographer] schedule is very hectic and changes all the time. He may be conducting interviews in a number of locations."

Another Playboy spokeswoman, Cindy Rakowitz, commented that Playboy has "done very well" at Villanova. She reported that the representatives have received over 100 phone calls from women requesting an interview or asking for more information.

According to the Inquirer article, Playboy has already selected

Curran to lecture at University

By MAUREEN STAPLETON
Staff Reporter

Controversial Catholic theologian the Rev. Charles E. Curran, S.T.D., will present the lecture "Academic Freedom and Catholic Higher Education" on Sunday at 8 p.m. in the Villanova Room, Connelly Center.

Curran has come under much fire in recent years by both the Vatican and Catholic University of America, the only American university chartered by the Vatican. He maintains that in some instances artificial contraception, divorce, abortion and "other practices forbidden by the Church" are morally justified, according to an April 1986 edition of the New York Times.

In 1986, Curran was faced with an ultimatum by the Catholic University of America and the Vatican. He was either to retract his controversial views or lose his authorization to teach as a Roman Catholic theologian. Curran refused and the Vatican revoked that summer his authorization to teach Roman Catholic theology.

Curran said, "The issue is whether a Catholic scholar can dissent from authoritative but noninfallible teachings of the Church," in a Mar. 24, 1986 issue of Newsweek.

Curran then left the Catholic University of America and was a guest professor at Cornell University for a year. Currently, he is a guest professor at the University of Southern California.

In May, Curran was in negotiations with the Catholic University of America to return as a professor. However, the negotiations collapsed when the university requested that he sign a statement stating that he would not teach theology. The university planned to place him in the sociology department.

In the May 27 issue of the National Catholic Reporter, Curran said, "It would simply be untrue to say that I would not teach Catholic theology. The whole world knows by now that Catholic theology is my area of competence and that my teaching Christian social ethics [the course he was offered in the department of sociology] would be teaching Catholic theology."

One of Curran's challenges is to the Catholic teachings that artificial contraception and sterilization are intrinsically wrong. In an April 7, 1986 issue of People magazine Curran responded, "I've maintained that these actions are not intrinsically evil but can be good or evil insofar as they're governed by the principles of responsible parenthood and stewardship."

To the issue of premarital intercourse Curran responded in People. "The full meaning of Sullivan loses election

By KRISTEN FALLAN
Staff Reporter

Ed Sullivan, associate director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education, lost his bid for state senator to Senator Richard A. Tilghman for Pennsylvania's 17th senatorial district.

According to Wednesday's Philadelphia Daily News, Tilghman maintained his office as state senator with 55.1 percent of the vote to Sullivan's 44.9 percent, with 99 percent of the vote counted.

Sullivan announced at a "victory party Nov. 8 that it was clear he would not prevail, but added that his primary goals for running were accomplished."

Sullivan's campaign manager, Joseph R. DesJardins, associate director of the Center for Peace and Justice Education, said that as of 11:30 p.m. Nov. 8, "It looks like we are going to win the two precincts that the Villanova students are registered in ... That is virtually not done. No Democrat wins in Radnor ... The fact that Ed won and Villanova students were transported to the polls and came out and voted is tremendously significant."

Sullivan said that the most positive result of the campaign was "the number of Villanova students registered in voting ... If we had anything to do with that then it was a success; it was worth doing it."

Sullivan explained that "from the beginning, the single, biggest factor in me deciding to do this was that I felt like it was an extension of the kind of work I was doing at the Peace and Justice Center." Sullivan said that had he not run, Tilghman would have been unopposed.

Sullivan added that he could not thank the Villanova community enough for their support. "They [the students] were my main support ... without them we would not have had a campaign."

DesJardins said that with the students' heightened awareness of the issues and the increase of students involvement, students can now, "if they stay registered and vote next year, run a candidate for local elections ... or run somebody from Villanova ... who fights for them.

Dwayne Ingram, a junior campaign worker, said the involvement with the campaign taught him to be decisive on issues. "You stand up for what you believe in and search for the values you've been brought up on in the candidates running," he said.

"My first reaction as to why we lost involves a couple of factors," said Sullivan. "The changing nature of politics on a national scene ... the so-called Reagan Democrats, who still vote Republican, the well-financed and well-organized Republican Party, and the sense in the whole local area that Democratic candidates don't run viable campaigns and therefore aren't worth the trouble."

Sullivan added that it was the results of the campaign, not the actual loss, that made running for the state senate worth the work. "I believe strongly in the democratic process, and in choice, and in challenging people on the issues. The two party system in this area has been strengthened. Villanova students have been energized even though we lost, we accomplished those things."

Hunger week scheduled

By BONA D'ALONZO
Staff Reporter

Villanova's 16th Annual Hunger Awareness Week will be held Nov. 13 to 20.

The events are sponsored by Campus Ministry with the Rev. Owen R. Jackson of the Center for Peace and Justice Education acting as advisor.

Pat Garvey, Anne Sikorsky and Lynn Callahan are chairpersons each overseeing three of the 12 committees.

Events will begin Sunday with student liturgies given at the 4, 6, 8 and 10 p.m. masses focusing on the hunger problem.

During the week students will have the chance to contribute to a letter which will be sent to President-elect George Bush. The purpose of this letter is to encourage him to remember the hunger problem as he is forming his cabinet and staff for the new administration.

A Run for Hunger will be held Monday from 3:30 to 6:30 p.m. Everyone is encouraged to pledge money for runners who will run laps around the campus.

At 7 p.m. on Monday, Sylvia Sudoc will speak in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center about her experiences with famine relief.

In addition, there is a Hee Haw Talent Show in the Day Hop at 8 p.m.

On Tuesday and Wednesday, a Third World crafts sale will be held in Connelly Center from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m.

At 5:15 p.m. Tuesday in the North Lounge of Dougherty Hall, Dr. Suzanne Toton, religious studies professor, will host a hunger banquet. Foods from the first, second and third worlds will be served to the people involved in the banquet.

On Wednesday, Msgr. John Coll will speak at 11:30 a.m. in the Connelly Center Cinema. Coll is a world authority on the hunger problem. All religion and peace and justice classes will attend.

Thursday is a voluntary fast day for all campus residents. On Tuesday and Wednesday, residents may sign up to skip their Thursday lunch. Food Services has agreed to give $3 to the Hunger Fund for each person that participates. Last year this event alone raised approximately $6,000.

The Hunger Awareness Road Race will be held on Sunday at 10 a.m. beginning in the Main Lot. Students may participate either in the 10-mile bike race or the five-mile run.

Sunday evening mass will conclude Hunger Awareness Week.

The proceeds from this year's activities will benefit Catholic Relief Service's Water Preservation Project in Honduras. This will provide irrigated farm land and uncontaminated drinking water to the Honduran people. Last year's proceeds were over $12,000 and this year's organizers hope to raise approximately $15,000.

Correction

In an article titled "Women's task force formed" in last week's issue of the Villanovan, it was incorrectly stated that "the task force was recommended by the Program Evaluation Committee (PEC) last spring." The committee was not directly recommended by the PEC, but by an outside evaluator who contributed to the PEC report. The PEC charged the Office of Social Action with the task of studying women's issues, and Dr. Diana McCauley chose to create the task force committee.

Dr. Edward L. Collymore, director of the Office of Social Action, is not a member of the committee.

The article incorrectly stated that "the task force has just finished developing a survey that could be distributed among staff, faculty and students in order to accurately gauge the opinions and needs of the community." McCauley said later that the committee has not created such a survey, and its goal is to "identify" a survey as described above from an outside resource.

McCauley also said that one of the functions of the committee will be to investigate "salary equity." The committee will not become a "vehicle" for enforcing that policy, as stated in the article.

Minority recruiter hired

By DIANE A. CILIONE
Staff Reporter

The Admissions Office hired graduate student Charlene Moore as a minority recruiter on Nov. 1, according to G. Thomas Bull, director of personnel.

Moore, a graduate student concentrating in the Human Organization Science core, said, "I am very excited and energetic about the position."

The position of minority recruiter was left vacant last spring when Denise Houser left the position to take a job with ARCO in Virginia, according to Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice president of Academic Affairs.

Over the summer, the position was offered to two applicants, who both accepted the position and then withdrew for personal reasons, said Cherry.

"Rather than delay filling the position with another search, we decided to hire Charlene Moore in the interim," said Cherry. Moore is filling the position on a temporary part-time basis, said Cherry.

"We will begin the application process again at the beginning of next semester ... Charlene Moore is, of course, welcome to apply," said Cherry. "We hope to have someone full-time by June or July," he said.

The position of minority recruiter was originally formed to aid in increasing the number of minority students, in accordance with the Mission Statement, explained Cherry.

The Mission Statement says, "Villanova attempts to enroll students with diverse social, geographic, economic and educational backgrounds. Furthermore, in utilizing its financial aid resources to help achieve this diverse student body, Villanova recognizes its responsibility to use part of those resources to assist the economically and educationally disadvantaged."

"The big problem in recruiting minority students is financial aid," said Cherry.

Financial aid is a problem in general at the University, but it is a particular problem with minority students, he said.

There are four minority presidential scholarships for black American students, according to Cherry.

"I would like to get to know all students, even though my focus is on minority students," said Moore.

Maternity leave policy to undergo examination

By JENNA WARD
Staff Reporter

The personnel department is presently working to revise the standing policies concerning employee's maternity leave, according to G. Thomas Bull, director of personnel.

"The handbook for service and support personnel of Villanova University" addressed to all full-time, non-exempt, non-faculty personnel regarding the policy states that "a full-time employee is entitled to an unpaid maternity leave of absence for not more than a total of three months after delivery."

"Accumulated sick leave and vacation may be used by the employee while on maternity leave, however, such use shall not extend the total time provided by this leave ... The duration of maternity leave may be extended past three months after delivery for medical reasons; or the duration may be decreased if you wish to return to work sooner than three months after delivery."

According to Bull, Villanova is trying to be a bit more complete in the analysis of the person applying for leave. He said, "As of right now, there are many different views concerning the necessity of the alloted absence time."

"Some people feel that the authorized three months should apply to the actual time of childbirth, while others feel this should regard the time after birth which is to be spent while the children are maturing," he said.

Bull went on to add that the present policy for faculty personnel will remain undisclosed to the public due to the revisions it is undergoing.

Dr. Diana McCauley of the Office for Social Actions has used the policy twice in the past two and a half years. Both times she said that the University regarded the subject in completely different manners.

McCauley said that "Regardless of place of employment, policies concerning important issues must be made public."

Bush calls for "turnover" in White House

By DANIEL MORIARTY
Staff Reporter

While Gov. Michael Dukakis conceded the national election to Vice President George Bush Nov. 8, Bush called for "a major turnover" in the White House and "kinder, gentler" bipartisan politics.

"We can now speak the most majestic words a democracy has to offer: the people have spoken," Bush said in his post-election speech.

Speaking on the proposed "major turnover," ABC News Business World Correspondent Sander Vanocur said, "Jim Baker ... probably will help staff this administration ... He'll want people who will do something about the economy because if he [Bush] is going to make any gains in the international field, it's going to be building on what he [Baker] has started as Secretary of the Treasury and integrating the U.S. into this emerging world order."

Vanocur named others "who will help determine what is to be done."

"One is Jim Wright, speaker of the House [of Representatives], the other is Lloyd Bentsen, chairman of the finance committee and probably [unofficial] leader of the Democratic Party," Vanocur said.

Besides calling for an "invigorating turnover" in the White House in his post-election speech, Bush also said the need existed for "kinder, gentler" bipartisan politics than in the past few years and in the national campaign in particular.

Referring to the tone of the presidential campaign, Bush said, "A campaign is a disagreement and disagreements divide. But an election is a decision and decisions clear the way for harmony and peace."

Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware said in a Nov. 8 television interview, "I see potentially more difficulty on a personal basis between the president elect and the Republican leadership than I do between the president elect and the Democratic leadership."

"If he can effectuate a 'kinder, gentler' America, he will have enthusiastic support on that agenda. We'll have our disagreements; we'll have our fights, but I believe there is plenty of room for cooperation because there are plenty of problems."

Although commentators call the presidential campaign the most negative in recent years, Bush said in his post-election speech, "To those who supported me, I will try to be worthy of your trust. To those who did not, I will try to earn it. My hand is out to you."

Biden said, "I expect all the chairs of the committees in the Senate are prepared to work with George Bush and ... find out if he means what he says when he says he expects ... a close relationship with the Senate and the House."

In another television interview, Republican Sen. Peter Domenici of Arizona added, "I think George Bush ... will surround himself with people who understand how imperative it is that they extend a hand to the bipartisan leadership ... in an effort to put together some accommodation."

Domenici said he thinks Bush's firm stand against new taxes "will be the big sticking point" between Democrats and Republicans.

Biden added, "There will be some fence-mending needed."

Conceding the win to Bush, Dukakis proposed "to work with George Bush and fight for the American people."

The Rev. Jesse Jackson complimented Dukakis' effort, saying in a television interview on Nov. 8, "Dukakis ran a good and clean campaign for having made such a tremendous turnaround in the last few weeks in going direct with the public with more Democratic Party support than when we'd begun the ... campaign."

Democratic National Committee Chairman Paul Kirk said he agreed in a television interview, also on Nov. 8.

"The Democrats put a crack in the Reagan coalition. People sensed it [the election] as voting for the present or the future. [They voted] for what they perceived to be peace and prosperity," he said.

Biden said, " ... There was no mandate in this election. This was not a Ronald Reagan election. This was not a case like where Ronald Reagan in 1980 and 1984 went to the country with a specific agenda and said, 'This is what I want to do.' Many of us in America did not know precisely what George Bush meant by what he said he wants to do."

Election ignores the real issues

By GAREN MEGUERIAN
Staff Reporter

If choosing between candidates in this year's elections seemed somewhat similar to choosing between breakfast cereals or toothpaste brands, do not feel alone.

Analysis

Time Magazine's Walter Shapiro, in the Oct. 17 issue, called this year's race the "couch potato campaign." The negative ads especially shaped our images of the nominees.

In this week's U.S. News and World Report, White House aide Tom Griscon said, "If you're unsure of your own positives, try to scare the voter about the other guy."

The candidates also seem to be hurting their own images through the negative ads. "There's less interest in voting this year," said Ken Grubbs, editor of the Orange County Register.

If no one likes this kind of campaign, why do the nominees run them?

A candidate can score more points by being more emotional than specific. Dr. Robert Langran, political science professor, said, "The public's image is formed by quick simple answers. The public asks for it and enjoys it."

Langran also said he believes that if the candidates did preach substance they would lose their audience. He pointed out that the candidates do not lack substance. The fear of negative public perception causes the candidates to hide behind an image.

Today's candidates have to perfect their images and their packaging and leave the issues on the back burner. "There are no strong personalities or overriding issues, so symbols and emotion are more effective than substance," said U.S. News and World Report's Peter Ross Range.

Planning and priorities discusses budget issue

By SINEAD QUINN
Staff Reporter

The University Senate's planning and priorities committee met on Nov. 2 to discuss the priorities of the 1988-89 University budget. However, the committee did not have a quorum and was scheduled to meet again Nov. 9.

The planning and priorities committee consists of the following members: four appointed members of the administration, including the Rev. Robert J. Welsh, O.S.A., who preceded the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., as University president; six appointed faculty members, including Dr. William E. Mattis, chairman of the committee; three appointed students, including John Lewis, Student Government president, and two elected alumni.

The process of determining the budget's allocations requires a cumulative assessment of a list of priorities which the administration submits to the committee. The priorities are classified as non-discretionary, capital and operational.

Non-discretionary priorities indicate that the priorities are imperative and must be included in the budget without discussion. Capital priorities are building-related expenditures, but do not include maintenance. Operational priorities include expenditures for the basic upkeep of the University.

John Lewis, Student Government president, is a member of the planning and priorities committee.

Each member of the committee receives a list of priorities and rates them as highest priority, high priority and priority. The committee also takes into consideration whether an item is short- or long-term. From this and other information, each committee member ranks each item.

Lewis said that the allocations are based on subjective value judgments as opposed to monetary value judgments. A member may present any information in order to support or refute a recommendation or resolution.

For instance, Michael Curtis, a law school senator, proposed a resolution at the Oct. 28 Senate meeting to keep the tuition at the present level — with a necessary 5 percent increase in keeping with the rate of inflation, Lewis said. In order to have the resolution passed, Lewis said he had prepared information and statistics that compared Villanova to other

AIDS levels increase on campuses nationwide

By JENNIFER LUNDGREN
Staff Reporter

One of every 300 students in college campuses nationwide is affected with the AIDS virus, according to a recent survey cited in USA Today.

Dr. Gary Noble, an AIDS official at the federal government's Center for Disease Control, said that if this report accurately represents the occurrence of AIDS among college students, then the "AIDS infection levels among students is comparable to groups that health officials thought might be at higher risk," according to the article.

For example, four out of 1,000 prisoners are infected. Noble said that a college of any size most likely has at least one case of AIDS.

The study anonymously tested 1,000 blood samples from 20 university health centers.

Rose M. O'Driscoll, assistant to the dean of the College of Nursing, said she believes that this statistic may be reporting higher figures since the blood samples from the health centers were from ill students. She said there is a greater tendency for infections of any type to appear in the blood samples.

O'Driscoll added that members of the Surgeon General's office are currently conducting a more extensive survey. They hope to voluntarily and anonymously test every college student.

Gary Bonas, assistant director of Student Activities, said he expected a higher statistic than one out of 300 students infected.

Harassment policy

This is the University's official policy on sexual harassment as prepared by the University's committee on sexual harassment and approved by the Board of Trustees. The policy is in accordance with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's (EEOC) set of Guidelines on Discrimination Because of Sex, which includes a section that deals with sexual harassment.

It is the policy of Villanova University to maintain an employment and educational atmosphere free of any pressures on employees and students relating to sexual harassment. Consistent with applicable federal and state laws, the University endorses the objective that employees and students be free of situations where sexual considerations form the basis for business or educational decisions.

Sexual harassment may be described as unwelcome sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and other physical, visual, or verbal behavior of a sexual nature where:

1. Submission to such conduct is made either explicitly or implicitly a term or condition of an individual's employment or education;
2. Submission to or rejection of such conduct by an individual is used as the basis for employment or academic decisions affecting the individual; or,
3. Such conduct has the purpose or effect of unreasonably interfering with an individual's academic or professional performance or creating an intimidating, hostile, or demeaning employment or educational environment.

Sexual harassment will not be tolerated at Villanova University, and employees or students who engage in such conduct are subject to the full range of the University's disciplinary policies.

Correction

In an article titled "Professors debate economic issues," Peter A. Zaleski, assistant professor of economics, was incorrectly credited with the statement that "national debt had actually dropped from 22 percent of the GNP [gross national product] in 1977 to 15 percent in 1988."

This statement is incorrect. Zaleski actually said that foreign holdings of the national debt dropped from 22 percent of the debt in 1977 to 15 percent in 1988. The Villanovan regrets the error.

Penn fans can throw toast

Students at University of Pennsylvania football games have won the right to throw toast, but not bagels, from the stands.

Security officials infuriated some Penn fans by confiscating toast from them at the Sept. 24 game at Franklin Field against Bucknell University. Penn students have been throwing toast from their seats onto the field when Penn's band gets to a certain point of the song "Drink A Highball."

The toast throwing began at a 1984 game, when the students decided to respond literally to a line in the song worded, "So here's a toast to dear old Penn," explained Steve Hurlbut, Penn's sports information director.

After security officers took toast from some fans, students began writing protest letters, circulating a petition and even threatening to pelt Penn President Sheldon Hackney with toast at future games.

In response William Epstein, Hackney's assistant, finally announced in late October there had been a "communications failure. We have no intent to try to stop the toast tradition. We intended to stop people from bringing frozen bagels."

Bagels, he said, are heavier and could hurt people.

Hurlbut agreed, but added the ban should extend beyond bagels to large packages of bread.

"We don't want anyone getting whacked with a whole loaf," he said.

Greeks blasted for racism

The president of one fraternity involved in a racial insult resigned last week, while the University of Wisconsin (UW) suspended an entire fraternity for being involved in another.

Both cases arose from fraternity parties that had racial themes.

At Wisconsin's Madison campus, officials suspended Zeta Beta Tau after hearing ZBT had held a "slave auction" party Oct. 20 in which students "would put on skirts, and then the pledges would be put on auction for the sale of their services," reported UW Assistant Dean of Students Roger Howard.

Others, however, were unsatisfied with the suspension. They protested outside the ZBT house Oct. 24, and pledged to return periodically until the chapter was banned entirely. Police arrested eight of the picketers, charging them with trespassing.

At DePauw University in Indiana, Alpha Tau Omega President Jay Hoffman told a crowd of 1,500 people gathered to object to a mid-October ATO "ghetto party" — which included racist graffiti and some celebrants dressed as prostitutes and pimps — that he would resign in embarrassment.

In apologizing for the incident, Hoffman added fraternity members would perform 1,000 hours of community service and might sponsor a scholarship for black students.

Black Panther speaks

By ELLIOT A. FUS

Bobby Seale, co-founder of the Black Panther Party, described himself as a "revolutionary cooperative humanist" during a lecture on Nov. 3 in conjunction with "The 1960s: Politics and Culture" Honors program seminar.

Seale began his political and social activity in 1962 and established the Black Panther Party in 1966 in Oakland, Calif.

According to Seale, the purpose of the party was to organize black revolutionary efforts against the white power structure. The organization raised the question, "Why should we fight people in Vietnam who never called us 'nigger?' " said Seale.

Commenting on the racial inequalities of America, Seale said that "Tarzan ran Africa." It was the duty of blacks to gain power, a process which Seale interpreted as "defining a phenomenon and making it act."

Referring to the Black Panther Party, Seale said, "We had some fools and we kicked some fools out." He illustrated some causes for adverse publicity, including an incident in which party member Bill Brent committed a robbery at a service station.

Seale also spoke briefly on his endeavors for political office, mentioning his 1968 run for the California state legislature. "I got clobbered," explained Seale. Seale also ran for mayor of Oakland in 1973 as a Black Panther Party candidate and won 42.5 percent of the vote.

Currently, Seale is a special assistant to the dean at Temple University and organizes student involvement in the community.

Seale is the author of Seize the Time, A Lonely Rage and a barbecue cookbook written last year titled Barbeque'n with Bobby.

Seale commented, "Ronald Reagan called me a hoodlum and a thug. He could have at least said I was a barbeque expert."

New meal plan examined

By LYNNAE BOROWSKI
Staff Reporter

Student Government's department of internal affairs is currently studying meal plan revision, further examining the issue of coeducational dormitories and discussing an alternative plan for tailgating, according to Michelle Ciccolo, secretary of the department.

To study meal plan revision, the department is writing to other universities about their meal plans. After the group has gathered the information they will write a proposal and present it to the University Senate, said Ciccolo.

The department is considering several different meal plans, said Ciccolo. One option it is considering is a credit card system in which students would pay only for the number of meals they eat. This would benefit students who only eat a few meals a week.

Additionally, the group favors a plan that permits students to eat in different cafeterias, explained Ciccolo.

Also, the department is still working on the coeducational dormitory project, said Ciccolo. Last year the department wrote to other universities and filed a report on its findings to the Senate. This year the department followed up the project by getting more reports from other schools.

"Right now this project is out of our hands," said Ciccolo.

With the banning of student tailgating, the department began working on a project called "picnicking" that would begin next fall. This would allow students to have games and picnics before football games. "In order to get this project off the ground we need student interest," said Ciccolo.

The department is also working on a shuttle bus project. If approved, the bus would transport students from Villanova to Radnor House Condominiums and Rosemont College. This would benefit the students who do not have transportation to and from the University, said Ciccolo.

Other activities the department is working on include a book sale and assisting other organizations with their projects, said Ciccolo.

Professor Lucienne Frappier-Mazur of the University of Pennsylvania, recently discussed developments in French psychoanalytical and feminist theory.

Her lecture focused on two contemporary writers, Catherine Clement and Helene Cixous. Frappier-Mazur discussed their 1975 collaborative essays, titled The Newly Born Women. These texts offer the first challenges to Freud's premises in his 1905 Fragments of Analysis of a Case of Hysteria.

In addition to being the first female professor granted tenure in the department of romance languages at the University of Pennsylvania, Frappier-Mazur has published three books. One of them — on the subject of metaphor — is often cited as a model of how such writing should be done. She is also the author of numerous articles published in prestigious American and French literary journals.

Robert Groden, author of "JFK: A Case of Conspiracy," will present a slide show and lecture Tuesday at 8 p.m. in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center, featuring the most recent and compelling evidence produced by his continuing investigation of the assassination of President John F. Kennedy.

Groden has, in over a decade's research, discovered evidence which suggests a cover-up of facts.

During his lecture, Groden will present slides and film evidence to support his findings.

He will also reveal previously undisclosed evidence during his presentation.

The official investigation reported that Lee Harvey Oswald willfully and singularly assassinated the President.

The Student Union is sponsoring the presentation. Tickets are $2 and are available at the Connelly Center ticket office. Further information can be obtained by calling the Student Union at 645-7280.

Soviet professor lectures

By JOHN J. LOGUE
Special to the Villanovan

Soviet academician Timor Timofeev told a University audience of about 120 people Oct. 3 that there is increasing support in the Soviet Union for strengthening the United Nations into a "world government."

Timofeev, professor of sociology and social history at the University of Moscow, used the idea of strengthening the United Nations as one of many examples of how Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's policies of perestroika (restructuring) and glasnost (openness) have stimulated new ideas and new movements within the Soviet Union.

Timofeev said that, in his view, "nobody can stop this trend." He added, "We cannot turn back."

In a wide-ranging lecture on "Perestroika and the World," the Soviet social historian stressed his view that perestroika is "a multi-dimensional concept" that has economic, social, political and moral dimensions and extends to international relationships as well as to internal ones.

He said perestroika implies more openness within Soviet political and governmental structures.

He commented, "We make mistakes and will probably make more mistakes." He added, "One of the greatest mistakes is to be afraid to make mistakes."

Timofeev called for much greater cooperation between the Soviet Union and the United States. He said he was glad to see that a recent article in Foreign Affairs stated polls indicate that most Americans favor cooperation between the two countries, especially on such topics as environmental pollution, drug trafficking, terrorism, cultural exchanges, regional problems and the elimination, by the year 2000, of most nuclear weapons.

Timofeev said he was glad that in the course of their presidential campaigns Vice President George Bush and Gov. Michael Dukakis had called for increasing the role of the United Nations.

Professor Timor Timofeev lectured on "Perestroika and the World."

Timofeev said that "we continue to criticize our errors and crimes of the Stalin period." He added that the Soviet people "want to have guarantees against the repetition" of Stalinism.

He stressed that World War II had made the Soviet people strong champions of their national sovereignty but that the threat of nuclear war had heightened their interest in a stronger international organization.

Timofeev is a corresponding member of the Soviet Academy of Science, director of the Soviet Academy of Sciences, director of the Institute for Comparative International Studies and vice chairman of the Soviet Committee on Peace Research and Disarmament.

His lecture was sponsored by the Common Heritage Institute, the history and political science departments, the Honors program and the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

Student group protests visit by Playboy one Villanova student, a part-time senior student, to pose nude. Although Chan would not identify the woman, he described her as "tall, 5-foot-8, a brunette, [with] probably a C-cup," in the article.

Details of the rally

As the students marched back and forth along Lancaster Avenue, various persons spoke to the crowd by bullhorn. Dr. Barbara Wall, O.P., philosophy professor, said, "No one here is denying free speech, but what we must examine is the underlying exploitation in this situation ... What does this say about the values at this institution? Playboy is against the sacredness and dignity allowed every human person."

John Lewis, Student Government president, carried a sign that read, "This body is not for sale."

Several male students voiced their objections to the protest during the rally. "There were a few, about eight [in number], who came out and didn't agree [with the proceedings]. Most of us came, though, out of curiosity," said Jim Lardiere, a senior.

Villanova students protested a visit by Playboy magazine, which is looking for Villanova women to pose for its "Women of the Big East" pictorial.

Another senior, Trino Boix, commented that "we wanted to see what was going on.

"I personally wanted to see if the rally was about raising consciousness about sexism, which I fully support, or strictly about Christian morality," Boix said.

Another student who attended the rally, senior Steve Brennan, said, "Overall, I can't disagree with them [the protestors]. But they are more or less discouraging women who may want to pose ... it's more of a picket line than a protest."

He continued, "Women at Villanova are intelligent and mature enough to make their own decisions ... One person cannot determine another person's values.

"You have great works of art [that feature nudity] on one side, and you have pornography on the other. How can you categorize what is between the two as sexist, and who can make that decision?" Brennan concluded.

According to the SASS leaflet, "Photographs and other art works

Bonas said he hopes the statistic will change behavior as "students here have to make more rational decisions about their sexual behavior."

Both O'Driscoll and Bonas said they agree that Villanova students are as aware and informed about the AIDS virus as any average citizen, perhaps even more.

In order to increase student awareness, Bonas proposed a multi-faceted approach. He suggested that seminars be offered for specific organizations. He also stressed the integration of AIDS education into religion, psychology, sociology and economics classes.

of women, nude or otherwise, have a definite place in our culture. But Playboy spreads are not art because of their context ... [Playboy] models are still shown off in suggestive, passive positions; their faces are not the focal point of the picture."

The leaflet also indicated that "Playboy helps to perpetuate images of beauty which most women can't achieve and which they shouldn't feel obligated to try to achieve. Women should feel proud of their bodies and themselves no matter what they look like. Taken to extremes, women's attempts to look like models can lead to anorexia and bulimia."

Norris commented that Playboy is "content with the number of women who have come forward. It has been a very positive response."

Rakowitz said, "You'll be surprised in February when we come out with the issue and you see your friends in the pages."

human sexuality involves a permanent commitment of love between a man and a woman. Pastoral practice here requires prudence in dealing with people who do not accept such an understanding in practice."

Curran responded to the issue of homosexuality by saying in People, "For an irreversible, constitutional or genuine homosexual, homosexual acts in the context of a loving relationship striving for permanency can in a certain sense be objectively morally acceptable."

Curran also challenges the Church's position on divorce. He said in People, "The Catholic Church should change its teachings on indissolubility and allow divorce in certain circumstances."

Curran is currently pursuing a suit against the Catholic University of America on the basis that the university violated his rights as a tenured professor by suspending him. In addition, he said that the action violated academic freedom and placed the school "outside the pale of American institutions of higher learning," according to a May 18 issue of the New York Times.

schools, such as Boston College, University of Notre Dame, Wake Forest University and Lehigh University.

The statistics show that Villanova's tuition is lower than many of these schools but that the average tuition paid, taking financial aid into consideration, is higher than most of these schools. This information, coupled with the fact that Villanova has the second-highest room and board cost in Pennsylvania, can be used in support of the resolution, Lewis said.

Lewis mentioned that a macro-budget is projected so as not to make requests that would exceed the budget.

"The projected budget is more of a check on the budget so that we can see how much money we have and make decisions with respect to this figure," Lewis said. "We must try to get away from the 'Christmas list' mentality which decides what we need without taking the budget into consideration," he added.

Lecture

James S. Coleman, social theorist and the author of Public and Private High Schools: The Impact of the Communities, will speak in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center on Nov. 17 at 8 p.m.

His talk, titled "Social Capital in the Religious Community: Outcomes for Education," is being sponsored by the University's Social Science Forum.

For the past 20 years, Coleman has been the author or co-author of books and articles on the subject of modern education.

The central argument of Coleman's work has been the superiority of private education as opposed to public education, according to a University press release.

Coleman has interpreted his data to show that a student's academic performance is affected more by external factors than by those from within the school.

He has further proposed that the success of attempts to counter these influences may not be possible.

There has been much debate over the state of the modern educational system in recent years and many of the questions raised by Coleman have provoked further discussion on the subject, according to the release.

In Coleman's most recent work, he further develops his argument for the superiority of Catholic schools. His work advocates the expansion of Catholic education and a redirection of educational policies to develop similar communities in secular education, according to the press release.

K.G.

This past year was one of conflict and controversy at the University. We are proud to say that the Villanovan was at the forefront of the controversy, due to the efforts of our departing editors.

Johanne C. Sharp, editor in chief, has written editorials on such issues as Greek life, AIDS, student elections, date rape and sexual harassment. At times, the editorials have infuriated portions of the Villanova community.

But they have also made people think and respond, and have resulted in enlightening our readers on several important issues.

Johanne has also succeeded in fostering a strong sense of unity and commitment among the staff. In difficult, sometimes harrowing times, she has shown by example how people should work together as a team to accomplish their goals.

Throughout Johanne's term, we have all learned the power of our words in conveying information about issues to our readers.

She has been supported through the year (and through the 4 a.m. deadlines) by several valuable people. Natalie "Nats" McKenna has performed the difficult job of associate editor with flair and enthusiasm. She stayed late hours editing letters and op-eds Tuesday nights, and last but not least, brought the doughnuts on Thursdays.

Managing editors Janet Diefenbach and Andrea LoCascio kept the wheels of the business office turning throughout the year.

Other seniors have also contributed, in ways large and small each week, to the continued success of the paper. They include: Art Editor Andrew Bullion, Features Editor R. Michael Bullotta, Greek Page Editor Jill DeForte, Personals/Classified Editor Michele Devlin, Assistant Features Editor Jacqueline Gentile, Layout Director Eileen McGinley, Entertainment Editor Kathryn Quigley, Assistant News Editor Jennifer Reidy (from Cleveland), Subscriptions and Billing Editor Pam Salter and Photography Editor Dana Shafie.

Again, thanks to all. In the immortal words of the award-winning sports staff, this year has been the coolest!

College enrollments rise

By College Press Service

The final figures are not yet in, but most evidence suggests there are more students going to colleges nationwide this fall than last year.

"We expect enrollment to be higher this fall," said Elaine El-Khawas of the American Council on Education (ACE) in Washington, D.C.

"Everybody I've spoken to refers to the fact that applications were up," said Bob Aaron of the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges. "That would lead me to believe that enrollments are up, but my guess is based on anecdotes, not actual enrollment figures."

The anecdotes typically concern jammed classrooms, packed dormitories and not enough teachers to lead courses.

In mid-October, for instance, Stephens College in Missouri announced it had too many students wanting to take and too few professors able to teach a basic English course next semester, and thus would have to turn away half the students signing up for the class.

At the University of Arizona (UA), Assistant Arts Dean Lynne Tronsdal fretted the UA's 4 percent enrollment increase would threaten the school's ability "to serve these students in a way that they have a right to."

The University of Texas' College of Liberal Arts is from six to eight months behind in doing degree checks for applicants, officials conceded last week.

No one will really know what nationwide enrollment figures are until at least "December or January," when the U.S. Department of Education plans to release its official head count, department analyst Norman Brandt said.

In its annual back-to-school projections last August, the department predicted some 12,560,000 students would enroll this fall, up slightly from last fall's 12,544,000 students.

"That's more people than many countries," explained Anne Grosso of the College Board.

Scores of individual schools already have reported their enrollments have increased, in some cases dramatically, since last fall.

Maryland's 19 community colleges' enrollment grew by 7 percent, but some schools report increases much greater than that. Anne Arundel Community College, for example, has 17 percent more students than last fall, while Montgomery College's Germantown campus reported a 20 percent increase.

"Families are sort of cutting a deal" with their kids, James D. Tschechtelin, director of Maryland's State Board for Community Colleges, explained. "They're saying to young people, 'Why don't you go for a [relatively inexpensive] community college for two years, and then you pick it.'"

Colleges in Utah, too, are reporting massive enrollment increases. Utah Valley Community Community College reports a 32 percent enrollment increase, while Salt Lake Community College has 66 percent more students than last fall. Utah State has 27 percent more students, while Snow College counted a 75 percent enrollment increase.

Southeast Louisiana, Arizona State, Northern Kentucky and Indiana universities, among many others, have reported record high enrollments.

So have the universities of Texas and North Dakota.

St. Olaf, Grove City, Del Mar and Rhode Island colleges, the universities of Texas-El Paso, Arizona, Pennsylvania, South Dakota and Dallas, and Mankato State and Northwestern State universities all said they had more students this fall.

Not all schools, of course, have increases. The numbers of students enrolled at Harvard and the universities of Illinois and Tennessee, for example, are down. Enrollments also are down at Louisiana State, Cal Baptist College and Christopher Newport College in Virginia.

Students seem to be the ones who suffer most when the population rises.

"There's no question I'm not as effective as I could be," said University of Texas biology teaching assistant Mike Scioli of the huge size of his class sections. "I can't tell if students understand what I'm presenting, because they're afraid to ask questions in such a large class."

Freshmen at the University of Pennsylvania have had problems getting into classes that were already overcrowded before they were allowed to register for them.

Students at Rhode Island College, Clarion College, North Carolina State and Western Michigan universities and the universities of Miami, Connecticut and Texas, to name just a few, found themselves doubled-and-tripled-up in campus housing this fall.

Campuses are getting overcrowded, moreover, just at the time when most demographers predicted college enrollment nationwide would drop precipitously.

The reason, they said, was that there are fewer 18-year-olds, the people who, traditionally staff freshman classes.

The U.S. Education Department, in its "Back to School Forecast," attributed enrollment's failure to crash to "a small increase in the attendance rate of the traditional college-age group [18-to-24-year-olds] and somewhat larger increases in the attendance of women, older students and those attending on a part-time basis."

But now some think it may not crash at all.

ACE's El-Khawas no longer agrees the number of 18-to-24-year-olds is declining. She believes the age group has hit a "plateau," while more of them are attending college.

But more significant, observers say, is the increased number of female and older students registering. "Now the average age of college students is 24, 25 years old," said Grosso. "There's a lot more adults going to school."

"There's a sustained and strong interest in college, and it's not just among 18-to-24-year-olds," Aaron concurred.

Society plans events for year

By PEARSE A. MC DADE
Staff Reporter

The Black Cultural Society (BCS) serves as a support group for black Villanova students through activities such as socials and biweekly meetings.

Karen Peterkin, BCS president, noted that there are few blacks on campus and said that "the society aids black students in the often difficult transition from high school to college" and provides members with information concerning teachers and tutors.

The group also familiarizes out-of-town students with the Main Line and Philadelphia and all the activities the area has to offer.

Peterkin said, "Our group wants the black Villanovan to know that we are there for them." She stressed the important function the organization performs in enabling blacks to make friends in a cultural setting.

Planned activities focus on February, designated Black History Month, and include a festival planned for Feb. 4. The festival will enable black Greek organizations from area universities to take part in an informal rush. Recruitment information will be available, and the night will conclude with a step show. Peterkin explained that the show will present the Greek groups performing dance steps and chanting slogans and songs from their organizations.

The society will hold its award luncheon on Feb. 12 when it will recognize outstanding service, the outstanding academic freshman and the members of the group. The highlight of the afternoon will be guest speaker Chaka Fattah, a prominent black Philadelphia politician.

On March 7, BCS will also sponsor a fashion show to benefit Bathanna, an organization which provides care for babies with AIDS.

Peterkin said, "We would like to do a lot more," adding "it's important that the University recognize us as an organization money wise." She expressed a desire for better recognition on campus and extended an invitation to anyone interested in the society to attend the next meeting on Tuesday at 1 p.m. in the Haverford Room of the Connelly Center.

Racial tensions increase

By College Press Service

Last April, as campus racial tensions escalated to confrontation at scores of schools, Princeton University senior Michelle Marsh went to a demonstration aimed at clearing the air.

"It was called 'Breaking Down Barriers,'" Marsh recalled. "The crowd that showed up was very integrated."

The show of brotherhood, however, didn't last. "Afterward, there was a dinner for the organizers, and I wound up being the only black student in the group. It [integration] broke down once again," said Marsh.

Her experience was not atypical. Black and white students may be friendlier to each other, but social segregation stubbornly remains the normal campus arrangement, students, faculty members and sociologists say.

Even the well-integrated anti-apartheid movement, which included nationally organized, fairly quiet rallies at scores of campuses the first week of October, has failed to keep black and white students from retreating to separate corners of school after the meetings end.

"Regardless of color," explained Monica Edwards of Wesleyan University's Black Student Union, "you're going to sit with your friends."

"We're not Utópia," added Tom Frye of the University of Chicago's Students for Divestment, whose members also tend to separate by race after their common work is done. He maintained, however, that "whether people sit at separate tables in a lunchroom is irrelevant."

Others are not so sure.

"Both sides can be frustrated by the lack of integration," sighted Betsy Lancefield of Stanford's Students for a Free South Africa.

It is just "the social realities of racial separateness," maintained Chris Jones of the University of Michigan's Black Student Union.

Dr. Jacqui Wade of Bennett College in Greensboro, N.C., also observed that the "integrated, unified" anti-apartheid movement still has not had a social impact on students' "everyday lives."

"We may go to a demonstration together," added University of Colorado anti-apartheid activist Jessica Fowler, "but the next day we don't hang out together. I don't know if that's a racial issue or not."

Many students and observers find the social segregation O.K. because it seems to be voluntary.

Cornell University professor and anti-apartheid activist Dr. Scott McMillin doesn't "think that is a form of segregation if by segregation you mean an enforced code that nobody dares to violate."

Jones comments the social separateness is explained by people tending "to relate to whom they are comfortable with. I am more comfortable with other persons of Afro-American descent."

"Minority students," McMillan said, "have a reason to stick together because they share an experience and a point of view that other students don't share with them."

University of Massachusetts Professor Meyer Weinberg, who has been compiling data about U.S. campus race relations for 25 years, concurs. "I personally do not like separate seating, either voluntary or not. On the other hand, to black students, this may be one of the areas on campus in which they decide what they want to do themselves."

"I don't think this kind of decision is a separatist one about life," Weinberg added. Instead, it's the black students' way of saying, "'We don't think this is a very friendly place.' I think this is pretty average for high education."

Nevertheless, some activists think the anti-apartheid movement has helped mix the races at their campuses.

"When we eat together," reports Ann Frand of Western Michigan University's South African Solidarity group, "it's blacks and whites together."

Marsh says social circles at Princeton are becoming more integrated "as Princeton attracts more middle and upper-middle class black students" who are used to mingling with whites.

At Yale, activist Hosea Baskin said, the "people who do political work together also spend time on a social level together."

And in spite of the separateness on other campuses, "everyone wants to be optimistic" that integration can occur, Stanford's Lancefield said.

Post-election results in to 90 percent of the voters. The Iran-Contra scandal also did not prove to be an important issue, according to an article in USA Today.

The ABC-TV exit poll showed that of those voters polled, 56 percent decided to vote for Dukakis after seeing the presidential debates and 44 percent choose to vote for Bush. The poll also showed that the majority of last-minute votes were cast for Dukakis, while those who decided before the last week of the election voted for Bush.

Despite Bush's victory, the Democratic Party continued its success in the House of Representatives, which it has controlled since 1954, and in the Senate, which it has controlled 28 out of the past 34 years.

Democrats added to their 54-46 Senate majority and retained a lead in the House of Representatives of about 80 seats. The GOP lost at least seven House seats, one Senate seat, and two gubernatorial seats.

In Delaware, Bush led Dukakis as indicated by exit polls conducted by CBS News. The presidential contest, however, was overshadowed by a spirited senatorial race between Lieutenant Gov. S.B. Woo and incumbant Senator William V. Roth, who was the victor.

In Pennsylvania, Bush emerged the victor. Dukakis had counted on Pennsylvania's 25 electoral votes, which were considered a necessity for a Democratic win, according to the Times. Democrats have won Pennsylvania in three out of the last six presidential elections.

Key issues for Pennsylvania Bush supporters were gun control and abortion, while Dukakis tried to appeal to residents in steel towns, the Times said.

In the Pennsylvania senatorial race, incumbent Republican John Heinz gained about two-thirds of the vote against Democratic challenger Joseph C. Vignola.

Dukakis lost New Jersey's 16 electoral votes after successful negative advertising by the Bush campaign exposed the governor's plan to dump Massachusetts waste into New Jersey water, the Times stated. Furthermore, New Jersey has voted Republican in the presidential election all but twice since 1952.

New Jersey also reelected Senator Frank Lautenberg, a Democrat, to the U.S. Senate. Lautenberg ran a confident race against his Republican challenger Pete Dawkins. Dawkins felt reassured by increasing support that was generated in the last few weeks. However, it proved insufficient to carry a win. The campaign was most notable for its fierce backbiting and the fact that it was the most costly campaign in the country, the Times said.

Eighty-three percent of the people who planned to vote said they "cared a good deal" who wins the presidential election. More women voted than were expected, fifty-six percent of the women catagorized as nonvoters actually cast their votes.

Love contract developed

By College Press Service

Students at some 500 campuses will soon be signing "contracts" that will obligate women to have sex with men if the men pay for their dates, if a part-time chemist from Madison, Wis., has his way.

Roy Schenk, 58, says he is hoping to generate interest in his "dating contracts" by sending samples of them to "500 campus newspapers and some talk shows."

Students, Schenk explained, would sign the contract before their date. Its provisions, he hopes, would give the man who pays for the evening the right to decide if there would be any sexual engagement "during or after the date."

"Dating exists today as a form of prostitution," Schenk said. "I'm asking women to either quit being prostitutes or be honest prostitutes."

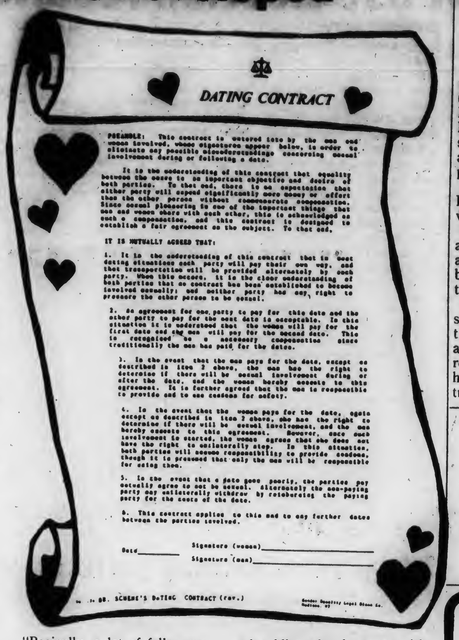
"I think the guy has a few psychological problems," said University of Wisconsin — Eau Claire [UW-Eau Claire] senior Barbara Shay.

Added Chris Tornio, another UW-Eau Claire senior, "I think it's quite a ludicrous idea that if men take women out on a date and pay for everything that they should sleep with them."

Others have used stronger language to describe the document.

In late September, the United Council, which lobbies in the state legislature on behalf of the student governments at 13 UW system campuses, condemned the contract as sexist and offensive.

Schenk, who conceded he is "not currently dating" anyone, contended everyone is not as hostile to the idea.



"Basically, a lot of fellas say, 'it makes sense, but I have a lot of trouble getting dates already without bringing something like this up.' Women's reactions vary all over the place. Some," Schenk claimed, "don't mind, and some are very offended."

There are, he added, circumstances in which a woman would not be obligated to have sex with her date. "If people go Dutch treat, obviously, there is no commitment for sex."

On the other hand, "unless there is a contract at the start that the woman will pay for the next date, the only honorable thing for the woman to do is take off her panties and be sexual," said Schenk.

Students pay more

By College Press Service

In what some call the "Chivas Regal Syndrome," a lot of young people apparently believe that the more they pay for college, the better the college must be.

In a survey trying to find out how students choose which college to attend — it also was to mark National Higher Education Week, Oct. 9-15 — 38 percent of the students polled agreed that "the higher the tuition costs of a college, the better the quality of education a student will receive."

College officials call the belief the "Chivas Regal Syndrome" after the premium Scotch whisky, and have used it to explain why Ivy League and other expensive schools continue to attract so many applicants even as cheaper, academically comparable campuses can not attract enough.

Few schools would admit to raising their prices solely to lure snobs. In 1982, George Washington University did adopt a consultant's advice to raise its prices in order to draw applications from people who ordinarily would go only to more expensive schools, but provoked a spate of bad publicity in the process.

The poll was commissioned by the Council for Advancement and Support of Education and conducted Aug. 24 through Sept. 7 by the Gallup Organization. It was based on telephone interviews of persons aged 13-21.

Only 20 percent said a campus's social life or athletic reputation were "extremely important" to them.

Bridge work goes on

By PATRICK MOUSSEAU
Staff Reporter

The Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority (SEPTA) footbridge near Moriarty Hall will be completed in early December, somewhat ahead of schedule, said George Rice, manager of the footbridge construction project for SEPTA.

He added that the Park View, Haverford and Bryn Mawr bridges will be completed in January.

Pedestrians from south campus and SEPTA commuters are among those who use the footbridge, which crosses the Norristown High Speed Rail Line.

The new bridges were constructed because renovations of the old bridges would be frequent and costly, said Rice. During renovations the bridges would have to be closed, forcing pedestrians to find alternate routes around the tracks. "Passenger safety is our number one concern," he added.

Rice estimated the bridges to be at least 50 years old. They are made of steel and wood while the new ones are concrete and much more durable, he said.

The cost for the Villanova footbridge is $235,000. The cost of all four bridges is $975,000. The contract was bid on by two contractors, said Rice.

The project is part of a larger SEPTA renovation project.

Mark Stitz, project manager for the construction company, said that there were no problems encountered during the renovations. He also said the bridges would be finished during December and January.

Both Rice and Stitz said the new bridges would be open during the demolition and cleanup of the old bridges.

Developments and attitudes at Villanova: Change over the year

Since the beginning of our term last November, Villanova University has seen many changes and has been at the forefront of national and local media coverage. The University has a new image in several areas and the Villanovan has played an important role in reporting these developments.

Villanova recently welcomed its 31st president, the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A. and congratulated his predecessor the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A. for his years of dedication and guidance at the University.

The ever popular term "student apathy" has lessened as students have taken a more active role in their involvement in the problems of V.U. Protests against tuition hikes, the appearance of former U.S. Attorney General Edwin Meese and the anti-apartheid march to Tolentine Hall show increased student awareness and concern for important issues. Most recently, the anti-Playboy rally propelled the new group SASS (Students Against Sexual Stereotypes) into the University limelight.

With the advent of stricter Pennsylvania drinking laws, the underage drinker at Villanova has been left to find other alternatives for social interaction. Student tailgates before football games have been eliminated and the control of alcohol at off-campus parties and banquets, especially Greek-related functions, has been increased. Activities such as Club Coca-Cola, a non-alcoholic event, have been successful, but more are needed in the future.

On the other hand, elections for Student Government president have lacked student support and have been viewed as comical by the average Villanovan. Ironically, more votes were cast for Homecoming king and queen than for president this year.

On a brighter note, self-evaluation has taken place at the University as the PEC (Program Evaluation Committee) has submitted its report and Villanova has completely divested from South Africa.

Vicki Huber has brought national attention to our campus as she competed in the Summer Olympic games, and the basketball team proved to be outstanding underdogs once again as they held their ground in the NCAA Final Eight last spring.

The Villanovan has played an instrumental part on several occasions over the past year. We sparked controversy over issues such as the role of Greek organizations at Villanova and the possibility of coeducational dormitories. We have gained recognition for supporting the Mission Statement and rejecting an advertisement for Playboy magazine. We have also raised awareness of issues such as acquaintance rape at Villanova and the AIDS epidemic.

Villanova has had a facelift over the past year. Important changes have occurred and we anticipate and encourage more debate on more topics from our readers in future editions of the Villanovan.

Letters to the Editor

Exploitation condemned

To the Editor:

On Nov. 7, about 40 men and women rallied together to express their views on Playboy magazine and its future pictorial: "Women of the Big East." As a member of Students Against Sexual Stereotypes (SASS) and one of the many organizers of the anti-Playboy rally, I feel compelled to address the specific issues of censorship, free speech and exploitation.

First, by rallying on Monday, SASS was attempting to educate others and make them aware of the implications of their beliefs and choices. By law, we are free to demonstrate for and speak of our beliefs.

Also by law, women and men are free to purchase Playgirl and Playboy. Many of the counterprotestors (those who were against our protesting Playboy) were concerned that SASS was suggesting censorship or even the denial of a person's civil rights. We responded emphatically that our demonstration was an exercise of our rights but not to the obstruction or impairments of others' rights.

Secondly, women in the United States often grow up "buying into" cultural ideals without carefully examining the implications or effects of these ideals.

Oftentimes, before we are even able cognitively to evaluate these social mores, they have become heavily internalized. Indeed, this phenomenon is not always negative and men are victims of this sexual delineation as much as are women, but women experience one thing more.

Women are also oppressed by gender roles because these limitations exist within a context traditionally labeled patriarchy. Granted, this oppression has evolved and continues to manifest itself by much more subtle means, but this subtlety need not detract from oppression's power.

Identifying a woman nearly exclusively with her body is hardly a new form of sexism, yet with Playboy this exploitation takes on new dimensions.

Playboy asks us to believe that the context within which this supposed "photographic art" appears is actually elevating and flattering to women. They also ask us to ignore the woman's passive submission to some men's ideas of female beauty which SASS believes is inherent to every pose.

SASS does not wish to condemn any individual woman for her choice although we do feel that the decision to pose is nearly always a poor one. We hope that the University will respect the rights of each woman who decides to pose by not attempting to punish or in any way discipline the student.

Students plan to sue Radnor House

By JONATHAN H. RUDD

Going to Radnor House Condominiums and going to Harlem have one thing in common. If you park your car there, the chances are very good that it will not be there when you return. Such is the result with Radnor House's outrageous towing policy.

The following are actual incidents which have taken place at Radnor House Condominiums, though the names have been changed to protect the identity of the individuals from any harassment by Radnor House Condominiums.

Bill, a resident at Radnor House Condominiums, had been studying late at the library and did not get back to Radnor House until midnight only to find the parking lot full. Since all the streets in the area have "two-hour parking only," he parked his car in a 'non-designated' parking area.

The next morning, as Bill got ready to go to school, he discovered his car was not there, only to be told by the management at Radnor House that his car had been towed and he could pick it up at some "mysterious lot" in Bala Cynwyd for $90, cash.

Bill finally got a friend to take him to this lot, which took over an hour to find, to find no one there. He spent another hour trying to find out how to get his car out of the lot, only to have an answering service in Haverford tell him that they did not know anything, and that they were only an answering service.

Finally someone showed up at the lot and he got his car out, only to find that his brand new paint job had been scratched. As a result, Bill and his friend missed a whole day of school, he was out his $90 towing charge and he ended up paying $500 to get his paint job fixed.

One of the most common incidents is a guest getting towed from the front of the building as they are picking up a friend or a date. Since you cannot park in the lot without a parking pass, and passes are not given out on weekends, the only way to pick up a friend is to park in front of the building and leave your hazard lights on. This is what the management suggests, but with one catch: you can only leave your car there for five minutes or it will be towed!

Forget any notion of going up to your date's room to take her flowers or a gift because if you are not back in five minutes, which is approximately the time it takes to go up in the elevator and come back down, you will not be going out on your date at all, unless you were planning to take a walk, because your car will not be there.

Another scenario is Bill coming back to the parking lot to find it full, but to see many empty parking spots at the doctor's offices. Since he knows you can park in some of these spots from 5 p.m. to 9 a.m., he finds the tow truck operator and asks him which spots he can park in.

The tow truck operator says that he does not know himself, but that since he will be the only one towing, that Bill can park in any of them and he will not tow the car as long as he has it out by 9 a.m. Bill goes to get his car at 7:30 a.m. to find it has been towed.

On a rainy day in April, Radnor House Condominiums made the mistake of towing the wrong person. This person realized that we are living in the United States of America where all citizens have legal rights, and that Radnor House Condominiums was seriously abridging these rights.

The matter was referred to one of the best law firms in Philadelphia which upon investigation of the matter found the towing policy blatantly illegal.

Though there are criminal sanctions, the attorney handling the case felt the best way to get the message across to Radnor House Condominiums was to bring a class-action law suit against Radnor House on behalf of all those who have been illegally towed from Radnor House, and seek recovery of all the towing fees plus additional damages which are recoverable under law.

One of the requirements of bringing a class-action suit is that every member of the class, which means everyone towed at Radnor House, must be notified and be given the option to join with the other class members in the suit. Because of the legal approach taken by the attorney handling the case, this includes everyone towed within the past two years up to Sept. 15.

Anyone towed after Sept. 15 cannot legally be included in this class action, but it is recommended that they file suit in small claims court against Radnor House Condominiums if they feel they were illegally towed.

The small claims court is on the second floor of 717 E. Lancaster Ave., the big building right next to the Villanova Post Office.

For anyone towed before Sept. 15, it is requested that you send the following information: your full name, address, (both current and home), a copy of the towing receipt, (if you still have it) and any other relevant information on the towing to:

Villanova Law Review
Villanova Law School
Villanova, PA 19085
Attn: Box #23 - Class Action

Through unity we can make a difference and force Radnor House Condominiums to change their outrageous towing policy.

Jonathan H. Rudd is a member of the class action against Radnor House.

Playboy is exploitative in its portrayal of women

To the Editor:

Recently, Playboy decided to recruit Villanova women to be part of their "Women of the Big East" issue. Their presence in this area has stirred up a lot of controversy: should women pose; should Villanova try to stop or punish those who want to pose; is there anything offensive about Playboy?

As of Monday, another issue was added to the debate when several Villanova students expressed concern that protesting against Playboy implies censorship.

As an organizer and participant in the anti-Playboy rally held at St. David's Inn, I would like to explain why I feel it was so important to express my opinion.

I am opposed to Playboy's treatment of women, whether they be from Villanova or not. Playboy's pictorials portray women as things to be enjoyed, not as people who have particular talents or dreams, or even the right to enjoy anything themselves. The problem is not nudity; models in many art works are nude. But Playboy is not art because of its exploitative context.

This context is the exploitation that is so easily written off by most people because it does not immediately affect their lives. Playboy's involvement with Villanova provided us with an opportunity to vocally object to less obvious forms of sexism such as the double standard implicit in the argument that posing as a sexual object is fine for other people as long as they are not people we know.

Similar treatment of men is just as offensive. The existence of magazines such as Playgirl does not justify Playboy.

I did not protest in an effort to stop anyone from posing or to stop Playboy from going ahead with its plans for a Big East spread. I do not believe in censorship and never once did anyone who supported the protest suggest that Playboy be censored.

We only wanted to draw attention, while the issue was temporarily placed in our laps, to the sexism against women and men that results from the format which Playboy uses.

Students Against Sexual Stereotypes (SASS) plans to compile a University response to Playboy's "Women of the Big East." Our version of "Women of Villanova" will more completely present the talents, accomplishments and personality of Villanova women.

Any art work, stories, poetry, essays, photography, etc. are welcomed and can be left with the contributor's name and address in the Center for Peace and Justice, basement of Sullivan Hall.

More information will be forthcoming and anyone interested in helping put this journal together is welcome to come to our meetings, Mondays at 5 p.m., in the Center for Peace and Justice Education.

Professor questioned

To the Editor:

I am compelled to respond to Dr. Hafeez Malik's letter sent to Chief Rowan Kelly, director of Security, regarding his refutation of a parking fine.

As a law student, I could afford a smile at Malik's rambling and uninformed creed concerning property, crime and the U.S. Constitution.

Besides, it does not take a legal genius to see that Villanova's parking permit policy is unfair and impractical.

(Suggestion: record the serial number of the original permit, issue a new one, and punish any student who attempts to park using the stolen one.)

When I saw Malik's comments concerning Hitler, Stalin, concentration camps and police states, however, I was stunned.

I could not believe that a university professor, of political science, no less, would state in a letter to another University official that "even under Stalin or Hitler, the sense of justice was never so twisted," going on to ask, "Punishing a victim for being a victim has never been practiced even in jails, concentration camps or in police states.

In which category, in your judgment, is Villanova University located?"

How dare he, and how could he, invoke comparisons to fascism, Stalinism and concentration camps in order to whine about a parking fine?

As a Villanova student, I am personally insulted by Malik's statements, and I trust that other students and faculty are as well.

Rally for dignity

To the Editor:

On behalf of the Students Against Sexual Stereotypes (SASS), I would like to thank everyone who came out and supported us in our anti-Playboy march on Nov. 7.

As mentioned several times during the rally, the purpose of the demonstration was not to advocate censorship or to ban the magazine from soliciting models.

We were concerned with the larger implications of Playboy's presence on campus. By giving tacit approval to such soft core pornography, we run the risk of slowly desensitizing ourselves to other crimes against the dignity of women.

Playboy concerns us because it sends a subtle message. By implying that a woman's physical attributes take priority to the other dimensions of her being, we set two distinct standards for men and women in which to judge themselves.

This attitude has brought such words as "anorexia" and "bulimia" into everyday language. It no longer shocks or disturbs us that people struggle with such conditions because of the pressures of our culture.

On the surface, it seems like a neat transaction; Playboy gets its pictures, the model gets her fee. The members of SASS believe that this sacrifice of human dignity is not acceptable — at any price.

Students invited to HEC retreat

To the Editor:

I would like to extend my sincerest appreciation to Patrick Mousseau for writing such a fine article in last week's Villanovan, describing a Handicapped Encounter Christ (HEC) retreat.

Mousseau's love and enthusiasm which he brings with him during a retreat was captured in each sentence as you read this story.

Yes, Pat we are ready for you and I expect to see you on H.E.C. 46 which starts on March 17. Let me take this opportunity to cordially invite other Villanova students to share in this unique Christian faith experience.

In so doing you will be affording persons who, because of physical limitations, do not readily have the chance of having a religious experience, because of both architectural and attitudinal barriers.

Margie Kernicky

Dobbin thanked

To the Editor:

I would like to thank the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, for recently taking the time to participate in an Honors Program colloquium. Dobbin spent 90 minutes on Nov. 4, answering questions from students on topics ranging from the sports programs to academic dorms, as well as asking questions himself that expressed his concern with promoting higher academic and social standards on campus.

The problems raised by students were certainly not new ones, nor were they easily solved. Yet Dobbin was able to reply to many questions in an informed, sincere manner, using negative circumstances as opportunities for positive growth at Villanova.

In my own experience at Villanova, I have encountered many situations where I find it too easy to be cynical.

It is so much more exciting to be confident that our president is someone whose dreams for Villanova are worthwhile and inspiring.

Porn shown at bar

To the Editor:

I am appalled! In Kelly's this past Friday night, what did I see? Part of a pornographic film! It was embarrassing as I had just met some new people (both men and women) and this little episode comes on the television. What ever happened to sports?

I am not part of the anti-Playboy protest as I believe it is the woman's choice but, Friday night I had no choice.

I did not choose to have a pornographic film on the television, nor did I want to watch one in a public place. I am not sure about the legality of the situation, but if I saw a sign on the door stating that they were going to show a pornographic movie, I would not be as upset as I am now.

At least I would have been forewarned and I would have made a choice to see it.

If I want to see a pornographic film I will, but I would like to be able to choose when and where I see it. Kelly's is one place where I do not want to see one.

VU Greeks make a splash for charity

By KAREN IOVINO
Staff Reporter

This Sunday, Nov. 13, the Villanova chapter of the Delta Gamma sorority is sponsoring its first annual Anchor Splash. Anchor Splash is a fundraiser held by Delta Gamma chapters nationwide, and Sunday marks the first ever here at Villanova.

Beginning at 1 p.m. at the duPont pool, all campus sororities and ten of the fraternities will be competing against each other in a variety of water "sports." Each fraternity and sorority has a team consisting of five swimmers and a bathing beauty.

The swimmers compete in four events; a synchronized swim, consisting of a two-minute routine performed to music; a ping pong relay, where swimmers will have to cross the pool with a spoon in their mouths that holds a ping pong ball; a sweatshirt/sweater relay, where participants must swim across the pool fully dressed, then pass of their sweatshirts and sneakers to the next swimmer; and a ball relay, where swimmers will try to make it across the pool holding a ball between their legs, then pass the ball off to the next team member.

The bathing beauty also has an important role in Anchor Splash. Dressed in nautical attire, each beauty had his or her picture taken. The pictures were then displayed in the Day Hop this past week, and everyone was encouraged to vote for their favorites by putting change into the corresponding can. Voting for the bathing beauties will gain points for each team. On the day of the event, the beauties will parade around the pool in costume for one last look, then the winner will be announced.

All of this nautical fun is aimed toward a very good cause. Delta Gamma's national philanthropy is sight conservation and aid to the blind. The money gained through raffles, sponsors, donations, alumni, bathing beauty voting and a $1 donation at the door will contribute to this cause. Half of all money collected will go to Delta Gamma's national charity, while the other half will go to the Roger Greeves School for the Blind in Paoli.

Villanova's first annual Anchor Splash promises to be a fun time for all involved, and everyone is welcome to come and cheer on their favorite fraternity or sorority in the competition. Sunday will be a chance for Greeks to show off their spirit, as well as a chance to help those in need.

Anchor Splash chairperson Lydia Rappold concluded, "Anchor Splash is a chance for us to show that fraternities and sororities are more than just social groups. It proves that Greeks perform useful functions for the community, as well as promoting Greek unity as a whole."

So come on out to the duPont pool on Sunday from 1-4 p.m. and cheer on your favorites swimming for a worthy cause!

Sorority hosts AIDS education lecture

By KARLA BECKNER
Staff Reporter

On Nov. 3, the Delta Gamma sorority sponsored a lecture on Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center. Gary Bonas, assistant director of Student Activities, was the guest lecturer.

"Everyone was invited to attend, but it was mostly promoted among the Greek organizations," Bonas said. "The lecture was basically to educate students on AIDS issues."

The lecture was combined with a video entitled "AIDS: You Are Not Immune," which was produced and circulated by the Kappa Alpha Theta sorority. The video was partially filmed at Villanova with many Villanova students involved.

"We discussed the causes and prevention of AIDS," Bonas said. "Any person who attended and listened to what we said now knows the precautions to take to be safe."

"It was a very informative lecture," Koleen Morris, a member of Kappa Alpha Theta, said.

"We hear all sorts of things but are never quite sure what's true. It's devastating the number of people who will be affected by it and how rapidly it's spreading. The lecture almost left you with the impression you were doomed."

Donna Bolcik and Jackie Keenan, members of Delta Gamma, found Gary Bonas an excellent speaker.

"He was very well informed and answered any questions we had," Kennan said.

"He made us feel very comfortable and directed the lecture in terms of college students to deal with our concerns," Bolcik said.

"It was scary because he was basically saying you need to treat anyone you have sexual relations with as if they have AIDS," Keenan added. "People may have it and not know they have it. In the video we saw people who actually had the disease, and they weren't the stereotypical AIDS victims."

According to Bonas, about 40 to 50 people attended the lecture. Both Keenan and Morris felt it could have been better attended.

"It was mostly sorority girls there. No fraternities were present and only a few other students came," Morris said. "The video was great, though, and Gary Bonas was very interesting."

Lasers zap Main Line market

By MEGAN GUIDERA
Staff Reporter

Since the days of Thomas Edison's invention of the phonograph, the quest for improved home entertainment has been endless. In today's busy world, what could be more perfect than having an advanced, high-tech entertainment system in one's own home? A new store in Paoli believes that they have the answer through the re-introduction of the laser disc.

LaserLand is a home entertainment specialty store that features laser digital audio and laser video technology. The store carries approximately 4,000 compact discs priced at $12.34 or less. LaserLand also carries compact disc players, video disc players, laser movie discs, combination players, large screen televisions, television monitors, surround sound amplifiers, speakers and accessories.

LaserLand, located on Lancaster Avenue in Paoli, opened in mid-July. It is the first store of its kind in Pennsylvania, and is part of a 15-store franchise started in Denver, Col. several years ago.

The Paoli store was purchased last March by William French after hearing John O'Brien, president of LaserLand Corporation, give a seminar in Philadelphia on laser vision entertainment.

The laser disc is a flat, hard disc. The five-inch disc is the popular compact disc that plays music in a far more clear and concise manner than records or tapes.

Laser vision and compact disc sound will compliment the video tape technology.

- William French, owner of LaserLand

The eight-inch music video disc plays the music while the video displays on the television monitor. The 12-inch disc can hold entire movies.

The various discs may all be played on one laser disc player that connects to a television. The laser disc player is comparable in size to a video cassette recorder (VCR). However, the laser disc player is more advanced than the VCR.

Because laser disc players use durable discs, and not tapes that wear, the clarity is much better. The laser disc produces almost twice the lines of resolution that a VCR uses. Thus, when one watches a movie on a laser disc, the picture is actually better than going to a movie theatre.

French feels that laser discs and laser disc players will not take over the video cassette world; he believes "laser vision, which provides a higher definition picture and compact disc sound, will compliment the video tape technology."

Laser disc technology evolved about 10 years ago when Pioneer Electronics helped introduce the first laser video disc player to the consumer market. Unfortunately, shortly thereafter, RCA introduced a disc player that used a

Sci-fi writing contest set

By MARIA LOVETT

Would you like to see your name at the top of the best sellers' list? L. Ron Hubbard's Writers of the Future competition may be your ticket to success. This international talent search is looking for fresh, aspiring fantasy and science-fiction writers. You would win a $1,000 cash prize with the opportunity to earn an additional $5,000!

The rules are simple. Any individual who has not previously published a novel or novella, or more than three short stories or a novelette professionally is eligible to enter. Short stories may contain up to 10,000 words, and novelettes up to 17,000 words.

The competition is a great opportunity for new writers. According to Rachel Denk, the contest administrator, a first, second and third place winner is chosen every three months. All participants may enter as many times as it takes to win.

The winners are awarded cash prizes of $1,000, $750 and $500. The winners' stories will be published in Bridge Publications' annual anthology which earns them additional money. Any original work of science fiction or fantasy may be submitted.

"The participants are all new or unpublished writers and they enter short stories from all parts of the world," commented Denk.

The short story competition is judged by top professional science fiction authors. The author of the famous Dune series, Frank Herbert, was a judge up until his death in 1986.

The contest was created in 1983 by L. Ron Hubbard, the science fiction author of Mission Earth the adventure series. Winners have ranged from college students

AT&T challenge: Wall Street without the risk

By MAUREEN MAHEADY
Staff Reporter

On Nov. 1, thousands of college students throughout the United States began a four-month quest for fame and fortune as competitors in the first annual AT&T Collegiate Investment Challenge.

This unique opportunity is sponsored by AT&T, but made available through Wall Street Games Incorporated. This organization is designed to allow individuals to test their luck and skill as stock market investors, with no threat of financial loss. Founded about a year ago by Tim DeMello, 29, a former stockbroker from Boston, the games parallel actual stock market procedures very closely.

Although all undergraduate and graduate college students are eligible for participation, the competition is limited to 25,000 people. Students who wish to participate must pay a registration fee of $49.95. They then receive an imaginary $500,000 brokerage account, a copy of Standard and Poor's Stock Guide and an instruction manual that explains specific trading strategies.

All transactions take place during the hours that the regular stock market is in operation. During this time, students can call a toll-free AT&T 800 number in order to contact "brokers" at Wall Street Games, to whom they relay their decisions to buy and trade certain stocks.

The object of the competition is for students to increase the value of their portfolios. They will receive a monthly personal account statement which will inform them of their own status, as well as keeping them updated on their standing in relation to other players. In addition, a monthly newsletter sent to all contestants will feature stories of the top 100 competitors for that particular month.

On Feb. 28 at 4 p.m., the competition will draw to an end. At this time, the top 10 finishers will receive cash prizes totaling $61,500, with the first place winner getting $25,000. In addition, all of the students and their guests will be flown to New York City. Here, they will be given an awards dinner, see a Broadway play and receive a tour of the New York Stock Exchange. They will also visit AT&T's Bell Laboratories and Network Control Center in New Jersey.

Finally, these winners and their guests will spend a one-week vacation in the Bahamas.

If an individual college has at least 50 students involved in the competition, the portfolios of these students will be averaged together at the end of the event, and the top 10 colleges will be awarded access to an electronic news and stock quotation service.

These various prizes are an incentive for students to become involved in the collegiate investment challenge, but even those who are not top finishers have much to gain.

The educational opportunity and hands-on business experience provided by this event have never before been available for college students. The $49.95 registration fee is a small price to pay for the chance to test one's ability and success at what could become a lifetime career.

Anyone who would like additional information can call 1-800-545-1990.

style in a record, similar to a phonograph. This confused the public and forced laser vision to be put on hold.

In 1985, Pioneer re-introduced the universal laser disc player. The present laser disc players are more reliable and provide excellent entertainment.

Laser disc technology is not reserved for movies and music. It is also highly beneficial to education. The entire set of the Groiler Encyclopedia fits on one side of a laser disc. The Space Archive Series, National Geographic, various art exhibitions and much more are all in laser disc.

The use of laser discs in education is highly rewarding. The discs will last longer, and the information is much more accessible.

LaserLand, which is across the street from the Paoli Acme, is an intriguing store of the future with a pleasant and eager staff. French is eager to "demonstrate and explain this technology to interested people on the Main Line."

"I wasn't rubbing it in–I just wanted Eddie to know the score of last night's game."

Go ahead and gloat. You can rub it in all the way to Chicago with AT&T Long Distance Service. Besides, your best friend Eddie was the one who said your team could never win three straight.

So give him a call. It costs a lot less than you think to let him know who's headed for the Playoffs. Reach out and touch someone.®

SADD gains support

By IRENE V. LANGRAN
Staff Reporter

The issue of drinking and driving is one that many students feel they have been saturated with by the time they reach college. It is a topic that they remember being endlessly discussed each year around prom time.

However, the results of combining alcohol consumption and driving do not always reflect this. The Villanova campus has not been an exception to these facts. Below is a sample of some of the facts published by the Radnor Township Board of Health:

— The likeliness of an accident increases three times after only one drink.

— At least one half of all drivers involved in fatal accidents have been drinking.

— Highway accidents involving alcohol are the greatest cause of teenage deaths.

One of the responses from the students of Villanova is the development of the Saferides program. This highly successful program provides transportation back to campus for students who are too intoxicated to drive.

This year, in addition to the Saferides program, the University has formed a chapter of Students Against Driving Drunk, (SADD).

Although SADD has been largely successful in high schools across the country, it is relatively new to college campuses. Villanova senior Dan Dougherty hopes Villanova's development of a college SADD program will become a "pioneer effort."

The likeliness of an accident increases three times after only one drink.

- Radnor Township Board of Health

The SADD program was originally guided by the Villanova Association of Commuting Students (ACS). According to Dougherty, the ACS vice-president, "the ACS should be the one to spearhead it (SADD) because it is a real issue to off-campus residents and commuters."

This is due to the fact that these people, as Dougherty further explained, are the ones most often behind the wheel. Though SADD was originally guided by the ACS, its members are quick to note that SADD has become its own organization, and not just a branch of the ACS.

Efforts to make SADD a working organization began in early September. In addition to the many students who gave their support at this time, a number of campus organizations expressed their commitment to SADD.

Some of these organizations were the Resident Student Association (RSA), Student Government and the Villanova Union. RSA advisor Daniel Remley feels the SADD program has a dual advantage. He feels it will first "... enlighten the students to the responsibilities of drinking." In addition to this Remley feels the programs this group is developing are those in which "students can participate in, instead of just listening to."

One of the first tasks SADD faced was to develop a logo through a contest held in early October. The result was a logo developed by Villanova students

Learn to party smart

By DAVID O'NEIL
Staff Reporter

The Beer Drinkers of America have started a new project to educate alcohol consumers. The project is called "Party Smart" and is headed by Nancy Olenick, Ph.D., national education director.

Olenick says that the aim of this program is to be a "constant reminder to realize the responsibility to drink. Our aim is not to encourage or discourage drinking but to teach responsibility. It is a personal choice to drink."

This program is of great importance to all. Alcoholism has gained increased attention since it was classified as a disease. This disease's effects on the alcoholics and the people they come into contact with have been the subject of much discussion.

The BDA offers "10 tips for smarter partying and hipper hosting."

1. Know your limit — stay within it.
2. Know what you are drinking — know the alcohol content.
3. Designate drivers.
4. Do not let a friend drive drunk.
5. Call a cab if there is no safe way to get someone home who has been drinking too much.
6. Food for thought — serve plenty of food. It slows down alcohol consumption. Also offer non-alcoholic beverages.
7. A good host is a good friend — make sure that the people you invite get home safely.
8. Close the bar at least an hour before the end of the party.
9. Care enough to save a life — don't let anyone drive drunk.
10. Younger brothers and sisters look to you as role models. Make sure your actions set an example which emphasizes responsible behavior.

The "Party Smart" project seeks to educate the beer drinking public on ways they can minimize alcohol-related accidents, according to Olenick. The slogan for "Party Smart" captures the sentiment of the Beer Drinkers of America: "When you party remember to ... party smart. If you're not sober or you're not sure — let someone else do the driving."

Big East Preview

1. Syracuse

By JOHN G. RICCO
Sports Editor

The Syracuse Orangemen have, over the past few years, continued to grow in national prominence, and the trend is sure to continue in 1989. Head Coach Jim Boeheim not only returns four starters from a 26-9 team, but adds one of the best recruiting efforts in the country.

The Orangemen will feature the aggressive inside play of junior Derrick Coleman as well as the wizardry of senior Sherman Douglas, both All-Big East players in 1988. Douglas, considered by many the best point guard in the nation, is as good as they come on the fast break, and has made an art form out of the alley-oop pass. Though his outside range is not spectacular, he did shoot 52 percent from the field last year and averaged 16 ppg.

Coleman, at 6'9", is a premier power forward whose presence inside strikes fear in most opponents. He is not only an outstanding rebounder, but one of the best shot blockers in the conference as well.

Boeheim is also blessed with the return of junior guard Matt Roye, a three-point specialist, and junior forward Steve Thompson, a scrappy player who can jump out of the gym. Both should start alongside Douglas and Coleman.

Senior Herman Harried, Syracuse's only other returning regular, has contributed in the past, but should see his playing time severly diminish with the arrival of this year's freshman class.

And what a class it is.

6'9" Billy Owens, generally considered the second best freshman recruit in the nation, headlines a group of six newcomers, all of whom could contribute. Center Richard Manning, forwards David Siock and Tony Scott and guards Mike Hopkins and David Johnson round out the list.

Though the Orangemen lost only one starter, center Rony Seikaly, the loss could prove to be devastating. Syracuse will not only miss the talents of Seikaly, but his departure leaves a hole in the middle which must be filled.

If Manning is not ready to start, Coleman may be forced to play the pivot, an idea he has expressed distaste for.

Coleman, who is more suited for the forward position, does not want to harm his pro-market value by moving to center. Boeheim could force him to change positions, but the coach has to be careful not to start any conflicts on a team which has a legitimate shot at a National Championship.

Villanova was 1-2 versus the Orangemen last season, beating them in the Spectrum, but losing both in Syracuse and in the Big East Championship game at Madison Square Garden.

In the Cats 80-78 win, center Tom Greis had one of his best games of 1988, scoring 20 points against Seikaly. If the Wildcats are to repeat that feat this year, they will need Greis to exploit S.U.'s lack of a true center and will have to keep from getting into Sherman Douglass, one of the premiere point guards in the country, should power the Orangemen's explosive offense.

2. Villanova

By DOUG SCANCARELLA

Not since Villanova's 1984-85 season have Rollie Massimino's Wildcats had such a good preseason outlook. That year the Cats won the NCAA title.

This year, after losing just one starter to graduation from a team that reached the final eight, a final four appearance or possibly a championship is certainly within grasp.

"Last year's team was the most satisfying, but this group is just an outstanding group of people. They are really dedicating themselves. We will be very competitive," Massimino said.

If Massimino was satisfied last year, just think of what this team can make him. This year's squad is essentially the same, except this team has experience along with depth.

The experience lies with three seniors, Doug West, Kenny Wilson and Gary Massey, and three regular juniors in Tom Greis, Rodney Taylor and Barry Bekkedam.

This year Massimino has added depth by signing four recruits — Greg Woodard, Mark Dowdell, Chris Walker and David Miller.

The Wildcats should be solid in every aspect of the game, particularly at guard with West and Wilson. The two have been together four years and are arguably the best guard tandom in the country.

They showed last season that when they stopped guards Rex Chapman and Ed Davender in the Cats final 16 win over Kentucky.

West, at 6-foot-7, gives 'Nova tremendous height at guard. He led the Cats in scoring last year, averaging 15.4 points per game and eclipsing the 1000-career-point mark. He is now less than 600 points away from the 2000-mark, and if he accomplishes that he will be only the fifth player in Villanova history to do so.

Wilson, who also reached the 1000-point mark last year, is considered the Cats best ball handler and passer. Last year he averaged 11.4 ppg., while dishing out 4.9 assists.

Another senior who has been a key contributor in Massimino's attack the last three years is Massey. Massey is the Wildcats best defender. He leads Villanova in steals and was voted the Big East defenseman of the year for Wildcat shooting guard Doug West is the center of their hopes for post season success.

3. Georgetown

By JOHN G. RICCO
Sports Editor

Georgetown Head Coach John Thompson has not had the best of years thus far. His 1987-88 Hoyas were run out of the NCAA's in the second round by Temple 74-53 and the U.S. Olympic team, under his guidance, was defeated by the U.S.S.R. and had to settle for a disappointing bronze medal.

Thompson will not have much time to "mourn," however, due to the addition of freshman Alonzo Mourning to his Georgetown squad. Mourning is, by most accounts, the number one recruit in the nation this year and is drawing numerous comparisons to former Hoya Patrick Ewing.

The 6-foot-10 center is the big man G'town has been lacking ever since Ewing graduated, and should compliment the stable of guards and forwards which the Hoyas return.

Heading this list of returnees is senior point guard Charles Smith, who averaged 16 ppg. for Thompson last season. Smith, who started for the U.S. Olympic team in Seoul, is a tenacious defender and a three-point threat who loves to shoot.

In addition, Thompson has four other guards returning in seniors Bobby Winston and Jaren Jackson and juniors Dwayne Bryant and Mark Tillmon. Tillmon will probably start next to Smith, but with Thompson's style of play, all four will see numerous minutes.

The Hoyas also return several front court players from last season's squad. Forwards Anthony Allen, Johnny Jones and Sam Jefferson, all juniors, and senior center Jonathan Edwards will provide experience and depth for G'town in 1988-89.

A recruiting class of Mourning alone would be impressive, but Thompson did not stop there. Also joining the Georgetown squad this season are 6-foot-7 forward Milton Bell, 6-foot-11 center Dikembe Mutombo from Zaire and forward John Turner, a junior college transfer from Allegany Community College.

"Turner is a 6-foot-7 killer and a great player, and Mutombo is a gigantic shot blocker," Villanova Head Coach Rollie Massimino said. "With two immediate impact players along with Alonzo (Mourning), they have to be the number one team in the country, I think."

Though Mourning is awesome and Turner could become a rebounding force, the fact remains that both will be first-year players in 1988-89. This lack of experience up front is a weakness which will diminish with time, but is a weakness nonetheless.

Another problem with this Hoya squad, as with many in the past, is their inability to shoot the ball from outside the paint. The 1987-88 Hoyas shot just 45 percent from the field and their recruiting effort, though fabulous, did nothing to improve them in this area.

Over the past few years, the Villanova-G'town rivalry has grown into one of the best in collegiate basketball. "We've had so many competitive games with them through the years," said Massimino. "They're probably our greatest rival."

The teams split their season series last year, each winning at home, and a similar result in 1988-89 is probable. 'Nova will have to keep the aggressive Hoyas off of the offensive boards and not give up the second and third shot opportunities which G'town thrives on. The Wildcats' success may hinge on whether 7-foot-3 Tom Greis can stay out of foul trouble and do some damage inside against the smaller but quicker Mourning.

Regardless, Thompson's luck in the upcoming season should change for the better. He not only has the athletes to play the aggressive swarming defense he likes, but has the titan in the middle to go with them. The potential is there, and if the young people develop into the stars they could be, the rest of the Big East is definitely in trouble.

Multi-talented big man Cliff Robinson will crash the boards for Connecticut in '89.

4. Connecticut

By WILLIAM P. SHEA
Staff Reporter

Look out Big East, UConn is back! This year they have all the tools and a plethora of experience in seniors Cliff Robinson and Phil Gamble, complimented by junior Tate George at the point. With a recruiting class that is ridiculously underrated, they will have no problem pulling themselves out of the gutter in the Big East (ninth out of nine last year).

Their sights are high, and with the momentum of last year's big NIT championship, expectations have soared. Nearly every poll has picked the Huskies amongst their elite list of top 20 teams. They finished first in the Big East in 1981, and with Jim Calhoun at the helm, that feat is within reach this year.

All eyes, including those of the pro scouts, will be on Robinson, 6-foot-11 center. He was chosen third team All-Big East, and with Rony Seikaly and Charles Smith playing pro, Robinson should dominate.

Despite scoring 17.6 ppg and grabbing 6.9 rpg last year, he was uncomfortable with his back to the basket and will thrive at power forward if Calhoun can find a freshman to fill the pivot.

UConn has not quite established a program that can recruit names like Mourning and Owens, but Calhoun did a great job in securing some much needed rebounding from his incoming class. The likely candidates to get time in the middle are 6-foot-9 Rod Sellers, a tyrant under the boards, who specializes in rebounding and shot blocking; 6-foot-11 Dan Cyrulik, a smart player with impressive high school stats (26 ppg and 15 rpg), who needs to tune up his defensive skills; and Mark Suhr, a seven-foot quality recruit from West Germany, who will have to bounce back after sitting out as a Prop. 48 casualty.

Until the freshmen develop, Lyman Depriest will start at power forward and Robinson will play center. Murray Williams should get the call at small forward. The smooth sophomore is a local favorite who will be continually pushed by the versitile Depriest, as well as senior Willie McCloud and freshman Chris Fleming.

While Calhoun will be hustling to get his big men in shape for some tough competition, his worries are of a different kind for his guards. Usually we are accustomed to seeing teams like Georgetown and Syracuse so full of talent that the player's egos must be delicately balanced.

Last year, Syracuse's Earl Duncan decided to transfer, as he could not find his rhythm while being platooned with Matt Roe. As unlikely as it may seem, UConn faces a similar problem.

The combination of dead-eye three-point shooting Gamble and George, alone comprises one of the nations most formidable backcourts.

Gamble rebounded from a disappointing 1986-87 season, in which he was declared academically ineligable. Last year he showed leadership and perseverance, scoring 15 ppg and becoming the team's co-MVP with Robinson.

George is often overshadowed by the leagues great point guards, but has been remarkably consistent (only 2.3 turn-overs per game) and is well on his way to becoming the teams all-time assist leader. He can shoot and penetrate, but must take more offensive risks to take some pressure off Robinson and Gamble.

Pressing for some serious time will be John Gwynn and Chris Smith, while Steve Pikiell will likely never get back to where he was two years ago, because of a chronic shoulder problem.

Gwynn is a prolific scorer from De Matha High, and Smith is a top fifty recruit who considered Villanova before deciding to stay in his home state. The two guards are simply too good to sit.

Villanova came out victorious in both games last year, but that was before UConn got its program together. This year we can look forward to two great games as Robinson and Greis go at it underneath, while Villanova's veteran guards battle the wealth of talent in Connecticut's backcourt.

5. Pittsburgh

By DOUG SCANCARELLA
Sports Editor

Despite the fact that the Villanova basketball team topped the University of Pittsburgh in their most important meeting last year in the Big East tournament semi-finals, Pitt still had the upper hand in the season series, sweeping the Wildcats in regular season competition, 85-73 and 87-75.

The '88-'89 season, however, is a different season, and the results this time should be different as well. This year, the Wildcats should have the upper hand.

True, Pitt has a tremendously talented sophomore class, and true, standouts Rod Brookin and Brian Shorter will play this year after sitting out the 87-88 campaign due to academic problems. Nevertheless, 'Nova should still have the upper hand because what Pitt lost last year is far too great to overcome.

Lost to graduation are both last year's leading scorer Charles Smith and the team's third-leading scorer, Demetreus Gore, while Jerome Lane, the squad's leading rebounder, declared hardship.

In comparison, Villanova lost their second-leading scorer Mark Plansky. The loss of Plansky was indeed big, but it was a relatively small loss when compared with Pitt.

These losses leave Pitt without a single scholarship senior, and only one junior. That is where V.U. has the edge.

'Nova returns three seniors, two of which are starters, and one of which was considered the premier sixth man in the country last year. Additionally, the Cats return two starting juniors.

Another advantage the Cats have over the Panthers comes in the 1988 recruiting class. 'Nova managed to ink four, while the Panthers came up empty-handed.

Despite these weaknesses, Villanova Head Coach Roland V. Massimino still feels Pittsburgh will be tough. "Pitt had somewhat of a loss, but they will still be competitive," Massimino said. "They still have a host of outstanding players."

Most of the players Massimino was referring to are sophomores. One such sophomore is point guard Sean Miller.

Miller figures to start for the second straight season. Last year, the 6-foot-1 guard averaged 9.3 ppg. to finish the season as Pitt's fourth-leading scorer. He also won the Freshman-of-the-Year award in the Big East.

Villanova should still benefit from the point guard match up, however. Wildcat point guard Kenny Wilson averaged 11.4 ppg. and played well against Pitt. In V.U.'s first game with Pittsburgh, Wilson burned Miller for 22 points.

Also returning for Pitt is Bobby Martin. At 6-foot-9 Martin should match up well against the Cats big men Tom Greis and Rodney Taylor. Martin averaged 6.7 ppg. and 4.1 rpg. Those numbers are expected to increase with more playing time.

Other sophomores returning include Jason Matthews and Darrelle Porter. Both started at times last year at off-guard, but neither compare with Villanova's off-guard Doug West.

Brookin and Shorter will also be in uniform. The 6-foot-5 Brookin averaged 12.6 points per game two years ago as a freshman, but sat out last season.

Shorter, who is 6-foot-7, has never played for Pitt, but was a dominant player in high school. He is expected to make an immediate impact, but he is still unproven at the collegiate level.

Villanova plays Pittsburgh on Jan. 28 at DuPont before travelling to Pitt on Feb. 20 to play the Panthers in Fitzgerald Field House.

Villanova is also deep underneath. Center Tom Greis averaged 12.4 ppg. last year while leading the Big East in blocked shots. The 7-foot-3 junior was voted to the third team All-Big East. Both centers ahead of him in that poll, Charles Smith and Rony Sekály, are gone, leaving Greis as possibly the conference's finest center.

Equally tough inside is V.U.'s power forward Rodney Taylor. After suffering through an injury-plagued freshman year, Taylor came charging back as a sophomore to finish as Nova's second-leading rebounder behind Greis.

Complementing Greis and Taylor is Bekkedam, a junior, and Paul Vrind, a red-shirted freshman.

Rounding off the team are the four recruits. 'Nova landed one of the best recruiting classes in the nation last year, adding depth to the already powerful squad.

Woodard, at 6-foot-6, will see time at both guard and forward. He is an excellent shooter with great three-point range.

Dowdell, at 6-foot-9, can play outside or inside. He is a good shooter and rebounder.

Walker, who will play behind Wilson, is very quick, and is an exeellent ball handler, passer and shooter. Miller will also provide depth at guard, and is a great defender and ball handler.

With Kenny Wilson at the helm, Villanova's offense is sure to prosper in '88-89.

6. Seton Hall

By JOE GUARINO
Assistant Sports Editor

Coming off Head Coach P.J. Carlisimo's first 20-win season, the Seton Hall Pirates should offer the Wildcats a strong challenge. Coach Massimino pointed out that the Pirates match up well against the Cats and perennially are a tough rival.

P.J. Carlisimo was the Chrysler/Big East Coach of the Year in 1988, with his team gaining the first NCAA berth in the history of the school. The Pirates graduated three of their top four scorers in 1988, including first team All-Big East Conference forward Mark Bryant. He was second in the conference in scoring and third in rebounding.

The Pirates also lost guard James Major, who averaged 17.6 ppg. as a senior, and Martin Salley, who averaged 10 points and five rpg. in the 1988 season.

The Pirates finished sixth in the Big East in 1988, with a record of 8-8, 22-13 overall. They averaged nearly 80 ppg. with a team field goal percentage of .490.

The 1988-89 Seton Hall Pirates will be led by seniors John Morton, Gerald Greene and Ramon Ramos. Morton averaged nearly 13 ppg. in the number two spot for the Pirates.

The 6'8", 250 lb. Ramos was a member of the Big East Championship All-Tournament team, averaging 11 ppg. in post-season play. He competed in the 1988 Summer Olympics as part of the Puerto Rican contingent. At the point guard spot, Greene should offer steady ball control as he did in '88.

Overall, experience marks the Pirates; as they have ten players returning, including seven regulars. Junior Nick Katsikis should be one of Seton Hall's top three-point shooters. 5-foot-4 point guard Pookey Wigington will be looked upon to pick up the pace from time to time.

Coach Carlisimo was able to come up with a wide variety of recruits, namely junior college transfers and an ex-Olympian. Australian Olympic player Andrew Gaze is perhaps the Pirates' finest recruit.

Gaze may have enrolled at Seton Hall in 1988, if he were not preparing for the games in Seoul. He is generally considered his country's finest player. In a 1987 tour of the Big East, Gaze averaged 31 ppg. as Australia's leading scorer. He will also be a threat from three-point range.

Guards Trevor Crowley and Larry Bland, who will be juniors, transfered from junior colleges in California and Arizona, respectively. They each possess an accurate outside jumper, averaging 20 ppg. with their previous teams.

Sophomore Anthony Avent, who sat out in 1988, is likely to fill Bryant's shoes as a part of the Pirate power game. He has been described as a Bryant-type player but more aggressive.

Experience and a strong recruiting class should provide the Seton Hall Pirates with a successful season. Although they have not been mentioned in any of the preseason polls, the Pirates will offer the Wildcats a challenge as they do every year.

Senior John Morton will be relied upon to pick up the scoring load in '88 for the Pirates.

Syracuse

a run-and-gun contest with Douglas and company.

The 1988 Orangemen are definitely a powerhouse squad, and how far they go may depend more on their team chemistry than on anything else. Nevertheless, with such a mix of experience and fresh new talent, Syracuse is a lock to make the NCAA's and is a favorite to take the Big East title along the way.

7. St. John's

By JIM BOWMAN
Staff Reporter

Throughout the 1980's, the St. John's Redmen have remained at or near the top of the Big East's circle of elite teams with a combination of great coaching, strong backcourt play and a quality "go to" player.

As the Redmen enter the 1988-89 campaign, coaching legend Lou Carnesecca remains, but the backcourt duo of Michael Porter and Greg "Boo" Harvey were floored by grades. Additionally, the graduation of Shelton Jones leaves the Redmen's roster devoid of this "go-to" player for crunch time.

Although Porter is gone for good, Harvey could return in January to become this prime-time player. "They lost a couple of their key people, but Boo Harvey will definitely be eligible to play in early January," said Massimino.

Replacing Jones at the forward slot is highly-touted recruit Malik Sealy, who will be asked to carry an unfreshman-like burden in his first season. Another freshman, Rob Werdann, will also be asked to log a good deal of minutes, with the departure of Marco Baldi, who has returned to Italy for professional competition.

Werdann, at 6-foot-11, enters St. John's as one of the top prep centers in the country, and he will be forced to mature quickly against the likes of Tom Greis, Cliff Robinson and Alonzo Mourning.

With the off-season losses, rugged senior Matt Brust will be forced into a leadership role, further strengthening the Redmen's powerful frontcourt. Two possible bench contributors are players with interesting Big East bloodlines: freshman Terrence Mullin is the younger brother of former Redmen after Chris, and sophomore Billy Singleton is the nephew of former Wildcat Ed Pinckney.

Some of the Redmen's biggest hopes will be thrust open the shaky shoulders of 6-foot-9 junior forward Jayson Williams. Despite flashes of brilliance in his first season, Williams averaged only 9.1 points. He must improve significantly if the Redmen hope to become an NCAA-caliber team.

Last season, St. John's split their regular-season series with Villanova, and dropped a Big East Tournament semi-final contest 71-68. The Cats upset the Redmen on the road early last season, but St. John's returned the favor a few weeks later with a 60-55 victory at duPont Pavilion.

This season, if the Cats are to harbor any hopes of a Big East title, nothing less than a sweep of the Redmen should be expected. Villanova's depth and experience should make these games mismatches, but coach Massiminois not taking St. John's lightly.

"The matchups are very similar, and that's why the rivalry is so good," said Massimino. "They have two great players in Sealy, who limits our [advantage at the] forward position, and Werdann."

Although Werdann is a potential star, 'Nova vet Greis should have a decided advantage over him in the pivot. Defensively, the Cats frenetic matchups should rattle the young Redmen, and trigger many fastbreak opportunities.

Without Baldi and Jones, St. John's also lacks the bulk to contend with hulkster Rodney Taylor and Greis on the boards.

This is the first time in years Villanova has had the clear edge on paper entering the season. However, history has proved this to be one of the most exciting rivalries in the conference. Look for this season to be no different.

8. Boston College

By JOE GUARINO
Assistant Sports Editor

Coach Jim O'Brien's Eagles of Boston College have improved greatly, after reaching the semifinals of the National Invitational Tournament in 1988. They possess much talent and are always a competitive game for the Wildcats, according to Head Coach Rollie Massimino.

When one thinks of Boston College, the name Dana Barros is almost sure to come to mind. As a junior, Barros was a first team All Big East selection, leading the conference in scoring with 22 ppg. He was third in three-point field goal percentage at .453, and eleventh in overall field goal percentage at .456. The Eagles, who finished at 18-15, 6-10 Big East, will depend on his scoring in the '88 season. Their hopes center around him.

Senior forward Steve Benton averaged 11 ppg. in 1988 and will be another solid player for the Eagles in 1989. He led B.C. in rebounding with just over five per game.

Sophomore Corey Beasley was a member of the Big East All-Freshman team in 1988, averaging nearly six ppg. His size should help the Eagles on the boards, as they finished second to last in the Big East in rebounding a year ago.

Coach O'Brien gathered a commendable class of recruits from across the United States. Freshman guard Bryan Edwards averaged an astonishing 35 points and 11 rpg., in becoming a three-time Boston Globe Division III Player of the Year and the 1988 USA Today Massachusetts Player of the Year. He will compliment Barros as a powerful scorer.

Freshman forward Cory Jackson averaged nine rpg. in leading his high school to the Florida state championship. Junior center Daryl Michals, a transfer from Sheridan Junior College in Wyoming, grabbed 10 rpg. in 1988. The acquisition of Jackson and Michals will definitely provide needed assistance to the Eagles' weak rebounding lineup.

Other transfers include John Stovall, who averaged 13.3 ppg. and 5.2 rpg. for the University of Pennsylvania Quakers, before sitting out the 1988 season due to his transfer.

Bobby Ray Smith should add to the already talented backcourt of the Eagles. He played two years at Chowan Junior College in North Carolina and averaged five assists per game in his sophomore season.

Led by big guns from three-point range and a strong backcourt, the Boston College Eagles should find success in the Big East. If they can harness the rebounding ability of some of the newcomers, they may surprise many people. They are not picked within the top-twenty by anyone, but do possess talent.

Although they were defeated twice by Villanova in 1988, they always offer the Cats a challenge. An NCAA bid is not an impossible dream for a team with as much talent as the Eagles have.

9. Providence

By DOUG SCANCARELLA
Sports Editor

Providence's newly appointed head basketball coach Rick Barnes was known for being able to really motivate his players at George Mason University where he led his team to a impressive 20-10 record last year.

Can he do the same at Providence?

That remains to be seen but if he is treated in the same manner that last year's head man Gordie Chiesa was treated it will be impossible for Barnes to accomplish what he accomplished at George Mason.

Barnes is starting off on the right foot however. He is trying to mold the Friars into winners by having morning practices and individual skill sessions.

Barnes further realizes that the Friars do not have a lot of bulk inside so he has developed a rigorous weight training schedule.

The first year coach will probably have to do a lot more than that to resurrect Providence's basketball team.

There is a great deal of dissention on the Friars ball club. Afer Providence, in a dream season, reached the final four in 1987, the team fell to 11-17 in Chiesa's first and only year. Many players got frustrated and complained to the athletic director while Marty Conlan, a forward, quit. Most alumni and students went crazy.

Most of the blame fell on Chiesa and he was forced to resign at the conclusion of the season.

This year Barnes has a more talented and experienced group with stronger recruits but the fact still remains that if the team falters early Barnes could suffer the same fate as Chiesa.

No one knows whether that will happen or not but either way Villanova should have their way with the Friars.

Last year the two schools split in head-to-head competition but the Cats finished with a considerably better record and with better post season results.

The one main reason Nova should have the upper hand is because the Wildcats have an advantage at center. The loss of Providence's standout center Steve Wright, Providence's 6-foot-9 center from a year ago, leaves the Friars without a true center, while the Cats return Tom Greis, who established himself as one of the best centers in the nation last year.

Providence has the 6-foot-10 Conlan and the 6-foot-10 Abdul Samsid-Dean, both of whom are very good forwards but lack the strength and bulk to be a true center.

After Conlan and Samsid-Deen Providence does not have much in terms of height. They are the only two Friars over 6-foot-8 while V.U. has four players of that stature.

"We are thin up front," Barnes said, "We have alot of young players who have to develop."

Outside the Friars are stronger. At guard they return Eric Murdock and Carlton Screen. Murdock, a sophomore, established himself as one of the best guards in the Big East while Screen has been playing adequately filling in for Billy Donavan.

Playing small forward and possibly off-guard will be Daryll Wright and Quinton Burton. At 6-foot-5, Wright is Barnes best three point shooter. In 1988-89, Wright, as the only regular senior, will have to develop into the team's leader as well as shooter. Burton, a 6-foot-5 junior, average 7.6 point per game.

Daryll Wright will be the man from three-point range for Rick Barnes' Friars.

BIG EAST WOMEN'S PREVIEW

Villanova women search for experience and leadership

Helen Kosiken demonstrates the form that made her the number two Villanova scorer last season.

By AMY C. SPENCER
Assistant Sports Editor

Last season was astounding for the Villanova women's basketball team, as Head Coach Harry Perretta and star player Lisa Angelotti led the Cats to their fifth consecutive 20-win season, and their third straight NCAA tournament berth.

However, that season will be difficult to repeat as the graduation of Angelotti, Big East Player of the Year, leaves a large hole in the Villanova offense.

Over the last few years the Wildcats have featured one exceptional player, most recently Angelotti, and before her, Shelly Pennefather, All-American. This season the Wildcats are without a clearly dominant player and it is uncertain what direction the team will take with no evident leader.

"I honestly don't know what's going to happen this year," claimed Perretta. "This is a very, very young team, with a lot of question marks. We don't have a dominant player this year. This team will have to play very good team basketball, because no one player can carry the load."

In order for the Cats to approach their 20-9 record from a year ago, their three returning starters, junior guard Helen Koskinen (10.7ppg, 2.8rpg, 3.5apg), junior guard Beth Pasik (5.9ppg, 3.9rpg) and senior center Carole Oaten (6.0ppg, 3.8rpg), will have to demonstrate the teamwork and effort that this squad will need to exert to succeed.

"We will be looking for the four juniors and seniors [Koskinen, Pasik, Oaten and Diane Decker] to do the bulk of the work," said Perretta. "Oaten will be a major factor inside and she will get the ball a lot more. Diane Decker will be starting and she will be asked to score points. She's a very good shooter."

Perretta will also look to sophomore Sandy Litkenhaus who earned a place on the Big East All-Freshmen team last year. "We'd like to see Sandy play the point-guard spot so we can move Helen to the two-guard so we can be a little quicker than before. We'll be able to press more and use two of our quicker guards together."

Villanova should be able to pull together and enjoy a successful season despite the absence of an Angelotti or a Pennefather. If the team can start off strong, they will be able to play confidently and up to the true level of the talent of this squad.

Perretta agreed, "If we can get some confidence at first, we'll be able to win a few more games, but if we start off badly, I'm afraid we'll go the other way."

If the team is able to overcome its inexperience factor, the Cats should be among the thick of the battle for the league championship.

Syracuse takes first in preseason predictions

By AMY C. SPENCER
Assistant Sports Editor

1. SYRACUSE

Syracuse was the Big East regular season champion last year and with three returning starters, the Orangemen and Head Coach Barbara Jacobs are looking for a repeat performance.

Returning 6-foot-3 junior center Angela Alston started every game last year and added 6.4 points and 7.9 rebounds per game to the Orangemen effort.

Joining her will be senior guard Simone Courtland and junior forward Tonya Hendrix. Hendrix averaged 8.7 points and 7.7 rebounds, while Courtland supplied 11.3 ppg. Courtland was elected to the second-team All Big East, and Alston lined up with her on the All-Tournament team.

Villanova Head Coach Harry Perretta expressed concern over facing Syracuse. "Syracuse is one of the teams I fear all the time. They are the most talented team in the league and I see us having a lot of problems with them."

2. BOSTON COLLEGE

The Eagles went out in style last year, finishing with a five-game win streak before their season-ending loss to regular season champion, Syracuse.

Boston College should continue its winning ways with four starters and five other players returning to the Eagle roster.

Center Carla Wenger (9.0ppg, 3.9rpg) and forwards Leslie Bjerstedt (11.3ppg, 6.0rpg) and Amy LaCombe (12.2ppg) make a more than capable front court, while junior Sue Fritsch returns to the guard position.

Three-point scoring should be B.C.'s strength this season. LaCombe and Fritsch were the league's number two and three three-point scorers last season when B.C. led the league in three-point field goal percentage.

Perretta feels that the Cats will have to play more man-to-man because of the outside shooting threat, but that 'Nova will be competitive against the Eagles.

3. ST. JOHN'S

St. John's surprised a lot of people last year when after a 12-8 start, the team captured 10 of their last 11 games and the Big East Championship.

The Redmen will be trying to carry that momentum over to this season despite the loss of three starters, including second-team all-conference selections Dolores Dixen and Lisa Smith.

Fortunately, returning is SJU's leading scorer and Big East Tourney MVP Sabrina Johnson (15.3ppg, 6.7rpg, 3.9apg). Johnson can play either guard or forward and will be the catalyst of the offense.

Joining Johnson is 6-foot-3 center Brenda Ginaitt (11.5ppg, 7.3rpg). Ginaitt was the league's top shot blocker last season and currently holds the league career record for blocked shots.

Together Johnson and Ginaitt compose a threatening team. Perretta feels that the Cats will have difficulties against St. John's. "They are more talented and experienced than we are. I fear St. John's more than ever this year."

5. PITTSBURGH

Pittsburgh ended the 1987-88 season with a 5-11 league record, but showed glimpses of future promise as the Panthers beat Villanova in the Big East quarterfinals.

The future may have arrived for Pitt, which has 13 returning players, eight of whom averaged over 12 minutes a game.

The Panther's top scorer, Lorri Johnson (14.6ppg), is back, along with senior guard Diedra Baker (10.4ppg, 6.2rpg). Teaming with Johnson and Baker will be Jennifer Shingler who led the team in assists last season with 101.

Perretta feels that Pitt has improved since last season. "Pitt is quickly becoming one of the better teams in the league. I see them giving us a lot of trouble because of their athletic ability."

6. SETON HALL

Seton Hall returns their two top scorers this season, and should improve on their 4-12 league record of a year ago.

Returning forwards Geraldine Saintilus and Debbie Harnett together averaged 34.2 points a game last season. Harnett set the single-season scoring record with 532 points, as well as the single-game mark with 35 against Connecticut last year. Saintilus recovered from both knee and finger injuries to garner a place on the All-Tournament team.

Seton Hall also returns 6-foot-1 center Kim Jones and guard Michelle Hart as well as nine other players.

Last year's experience should have prepared Harnett and Saintilus for the tough competition which the Pirates will face as they attempt to climb in the standing this season.

7. PROVIDENCE

With a sixth-place finish last year, Providence had its worst season since 1984-85, and with the loss of two starters, including top scorer Doreen Ferguson (15.7ppg, 8.6rpg) the Lady Friars may be in trouble.

Defense was a major problem last year with Providence giving up an average of 80.1 ppg. Key in the Friar defensive rebuilding will be junior guard Helen Jessie. Jessie had 62 steals last year, for a conference-leading 2.8 average.

Head Coach Bob Foley has high expectations for freshman recruit Tracey Lis. Lis was named to the Converse All-America team and is the all-time scoring champion in Connecticut, either male or female.

Foley hopes Jessie's defense and Lis's offense can stop the Lady Friars's downward slide.

8. CONNECTICUT

Connecticut achieved a 9-7 league record last season, but the loss of top player Renee Najarian and six other players darkens the outlook for the Huskies.

Najarian led the league in rebounding for the second time last season, and is among the career leaders in five categories including scoring and rebounding. Her absence will be difficult for Connecticut to recover from.

Head Coach Geno Auriemma will be looking to returning all-freshmen selections Laura Lishness and Kerry Bascom for leadership over the six U. Conn recruits.

Much responsibility will fall to these six rookies whose ranks include standout All-America Meghan Pattyson. The freshmen should see a substantial amount of playing time making the Huskies a rather inexperienced team.

9. GEORGETOWN

Georgetown posted a dismal 3-13 league record in 1987-88 even though forward Beth Knight was the Big East scoring champion with 20.6 ppg.

This season, with the loss of Knight, who basically was the Hoya offense, to graduation, the future looks bleak.

But Villanova will face the Hoyas with just as much apprehension as Syracuse. Perretta explains, "I see threats coming from everybody. Georgetown played tough against us last year and I don't take anybody for granted."

Hoya Coach Pat Knapp will be depending on his recruiting class to keep Georgetown alive. Tricia Corace and Peggi Jewell, who attended the same high school and both averaged 17 ppg, are expected to challenge for the starting forward position left vacant by Knight.

Dance-a-thon raises funds and awareness

By NORMA LAMANA
Staff Reporter

Six hundred guests, including company representatives, friends of the volunteers, members of the community and students from Villanova, Haverford, Temple, St. Joseph's, Drexel and LaSalle flocked to the Independence II Dance-a-thon held Nov. 5 in the recreation building of St. Joseph's University.

Along with the spirited dancers and countless volunteers, representatives from radio stations, media companies and various corporations donated time and energy to the event, and endorsed a day of great music, activity and social awareness from noon to 10 p.m.

Independence II was the result of a cooperative effort between Lincoln Investment and the Community Occupational Readiness and Placement Program (CORPP), a nine-year-old organization dedicated to the integration of disadvantaged persons into the general population.

The dance itself was the culminating event in a series of CORPP week activities. According to Lorenzo Hough, CORPP director of job placement, the week began with a celebration atop the First Pennsylvania Tower in Center City Square on Oct. 28.

A proclamation by Governor Casey recognizing CORPP's dedication to human services was followed by a presentation by the first lady of the commonwealth, Ellen Casey, on the problems of adult illiteracy. Her achievement and leadership in the field of adult literacy in Pennsylvania were rewarded in turn with a CORPP award.

On Oct. 4, Franklin G. Mont, deputy secretary for the Department of Labor and Industry, delivered a presentation on the cooperative efforts of CORPP and the Dept. of Labor.

On Oct. 27 there was a similar proclamation of CORPP's achievements delivered by city council representative George Burrell in the council chambers. The CORPP week finale — Independence II — united several radio stations including WDAC, WMMR and Power 99 and celebrities from each; E.C. Larock, Mark the Shark and Jo Jo Davis, respectively.

Two sound companies — On the Town Sound and Jerry Blavat and the '50s Revival — were also in attendance, and a portion of the dance was recorded by Wade Cablevision to be aired sometime in the future.

The program itself offers help to homeless adults, education in corporate clerical skills, aid to disadvantaged teenagers, literacy training and more. Gary Yates, CORPP representative and a key figure in CORPP week preparation, began plans for the dance-a-thon by traveling to various college campuses and company sites describing both the program and the premise for the dance.

"Not everybody," Yates explained, "has attained their dream of personal independence promised them with the original Declaration of Independence and we are trying to fulfill that by the year 2000."

Visitors to the first-annual dance-a-thon to benefit CORPP were presented with dance kits containing instructions and guidelines, a sponsor sheet, a validation card recording hours danced, thank you notes to be mailed to sponsors and a description of CORPP and its goals written by the executive director of the program, Robert C. Gay.

At the end of the dance, some dancers received plaques donated by Foster Trophy and Awards Co.

Proceeds from Independence II were mailed directly to Lincoln Investment, an investment planning institute supplying much of the funding for the dance, revealing a bonafide interest in assisting the homeless and other groups benefitted by CORPP. Other institutions involved in CORPP week included First Pennsylvania Bank, Pennwalt, TAC Temps and St. Joseph's University, who provided the space for the dance-a-thon free of charge.

Robert Gay, executive director of CORPP since its founding nine years ago, has watched the clientele served by the company grow from 100 to 1,200 persons a year. The company began by working with young people such as school drop-outs and teen parents, then expanded to provide assistance to the homeless and other groups. Fifty volunteers provide services for the adult literacy program.

"We're committed," Gay explained, "to helping second class citizens make the transition to first class by developing their reading and occupational skills. We're dedicated to helping those who are dependent become independent."

"Part of our dream," Yates agreed, "is to have this generation, who will be the leaders in the year 2000, recognize the situation of those who have the greatest need."

Students interested in contacting CORPP for further information can call CORPP at 592-8011 or Gary Yates at 592-7217.

A call for safe driving

Andrew Marino and Bill Dolan. Each of the winners received a prize of $50, which was sponsored by Villanova's Center for Alcohol and Drug Assistance, under the direction of Janice Janosik.

The SADD Organization has also been actively engaged in the formation of a "Designated Driver" program. This program oversees the distribution of pins that identify designated drivers, those people who agree not to drink and to help provide safe transportation home. Designated drivers will be given pins which will allow them to be given free non-alcoholic drinks at certain participating area bars.

In addition to these programs, SADD is planning to distribute a SADD/Saferides business card to all Villanova students. This card will have the Saferides phone number printed on it. A large portion of these cards have been donated by local printers to display their support for both programs.

SADD is also hoping to distribute contracts through various campus organizations. They will be signed by students to pledge their commitment not to drink and drive.

Dougherty has said the response to SADD at Villanova has been " ... incredible. I hope it keeps building!" The SADD organization is also eager to add that they are still looking for many new members to help in their efforts. Anyone interested is asked to call 645-7211, or stop by 215 Dougherty Hall.

U2 album ends anthem days

Rattle and Hum
U2
Island Records

Well here it is: the new album. Is it country? Is it American rock and soul? Is it Irish? Just what is it?

U2's new album Rattle and Hum tries to be all this and more. It represents a somewhat hesitant step forward for the most popular band in America.

Rattle and Hum is nothing if not varied. While it is a mix of live material from the "Joshua Tree" tour and new studio work, it also blends the musical influences past and present that shape and fascinate U2.

This album is obviously heavily indebted to the 1960s. The first song on side 1 is a live version of the infamous Beatle song, "Helter Skelter." While Bono gets points for trying to "steal back" this song from Charles Manson, it suffers, like most 1980s remakes, from a chronic lack of original energy.

The band more than makes up for this flaw, though, on their tribute to John Lennon, "God Part II." Combining a lyric and vocal style reminiscent of "Imagine," Bono sings of Elvis Presley's and Lennon's pseudo-biographer: "I don't believe in Goldman his type like a curse/ Instant karma's gonna get him if I don't get him first."

The past continues to be remembered on "All Along the Watchtower," the song Bob Dylan penned for Jimi Hendrix. A piece of Hendrix's "Star Spangled Banner" also serves as a strangely fitting introduction to the wall of sound that is the live "Bullet the Blue Sky."

Dylan appears again as well, loaning the vocal talents that could only be his to the country flavored "Love Rescue Me."

U2's final bow is to the band's gospel, soul and blues roots. The inspirational gospel "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For" and the tribute to Billie Holiday on "Angel of Harlem" both stand as a plunge into a fresh sound for the Dublin band.

Above both of these, though, is the song "When Love Comes to Town," sung with the quasi-legendary figure B.B. King. It is a gutsy rip into American blues and a great song to crank.

U2's purpose in including some reverence for the 1960's is not to deify it, however. Bono sings on "God II," "I don't believe in the '60s in the golden age of pop/ You glorify the past when the future dries up."

Of course, the U2 sound and message is here. Their music continues to push into new bounds though, as illustrated by the decent western-flavored song "Desire," which the pop stations have been force-feeding the public for about a month now.

Especially notable is the slower song "Heartland" and the final song on the album "All I Want Is You." "Heartland," which deals with the American heartland, is the perfection of U2's surreal Unforgettable Fire sound.

"All I Want Is You," arguably the best studio song on the album, could be titled "With or Without You, Part Two." The song contains the same very sparse but compelling musical style that made "With or Without You" such a great song.

On the whole, the album is nicely balanced between the live and studio tracks. Also, instead of putting all the new songs on one side and the live older tracks on the other, the songs are mixed and varied. This way, it is not as easy to listen to just one side over and over.

Hendrix's "Star Spangled Banner" also serves as a strangely fitting introduction to the wall of sound that is the live "Bullet The Blue Sky"

U2 have not lost their conscience either, but neither do they overload the listener with it. The outstanding live song "Silver and Gold," about white oppression in South Africa, taken from the Sun City album, and a moving live "Pride" keep the conscience alive.

Low points include the already lethargic "Love Rescue Me," made more unbearable by Dylan's trademark off-key crooning. The Edge's attempt at solo singing on the obscure "Van Diemen's Land" brings the realization of what a better job he does at singing backup.

A fortunate high point indicated by this album though, is that U2 is showing a tendency to lighten up just a little bit. Bono, while still dealing with serious stuff, really seems to enjoy himself on a couple of songs, notably "Angel of Harlem" and "When Love Comes to Town."

It is usually a good sign when a band keeps trying new styles and material. In U2's case, it has rocketed them to super-stardom.

On Rattle and Hum, they take the next step from their hugely successful last album.

Many people contend that U2 reached their musical pinnacle with the anthematic War album. Every record since has been nothing but a further step toward the bland mediocrity of the Top-40 charts, they say.

Rattle and Hum, with its wide ensemble of musical sources, is anything but bland. It is also anything but perfect. It remains, however, an extremely enjoyable album, regardless of its faults. The anthem days are over, but the music and the message continue.

U2 movie has no soul

★★½

U2's movie, "Rattle and Hum" had extensive shots of the band members performing in shadows; just their outline is visible on screen. That was the basic problem with this movie — the outline of U2 was seen, but their interiors were never explored.

Fans of the group had been eagerly awaiting the release of the movie, which documents the making of the album Rattle and Hum as well as last year's Joshua Tree tour. Perhaps they should keep waiting, because this was not the quintessential U2 movie.

Director Phil Jounou is a fan of the group and this itself may be the reason the film does not quite work. His admiration and enthusiasm for the band came across almost as worship. U2 is the last band that should be worshipped; once that happens they will have lost the ideals that made them U2.

There are extensive shots of the band members being backlit, with an almost halo effect around them. Jounou sometimes shot from the ground up, so that the band looked larger than life. At the beginning of the movie, there was a scene where Jounou interviewed the band. "What do you think this movie is about?" he asked. Larry Mullen, Jr., the group's drummer, facetiously replied, "It's a musical journey." The exchange was meant to be funny, perhaps in satiric "This Is Spinal Tap" fashion. What is scary is the possibility that Jounou really meant to ask such an asinine question.

The film was 85 percent concert footage, most of which was shot in black and white. This was very effective and added an edge to the concert scenes. The songs performed first were from Rattle and Hum and went in album order.

When the band sang their hits from the The Joshua Tree, the album that brought the group success and placed them right in the middle of pop culture, Jounou switched to color film. Toward the end, as they performed their earlier music, such as "MLK" and "Bad," Jounou used black-and-white film again.

Standout concert numbers included the re-make of "Bullet the Blue Sky," "Bad," the song that made U2 famous at Live-Aid and "With or Without You." The version of that song was positively exhilarating.

However, as much as this was a concert movie, the audience was practically unseen. There was no real interaction with the crowd; no climbing off the stage to hug fans and no standing on amplifiers to see all parts of the crowd. That connection between U2 and the audience is the key to the band's success and Jounou missed it.

Jounou also showed practically nothing of the band off-stage. Why are they a band? Why are they friends? What is it like to be a successful band while still maintaining a political edge to their songs? Jounou shed no light on these questions and the result was unsatisfying.

Despite Jounou's mistakes, this movie was worth seeing because of U2. The concert footage was incredible; the average U2 fan will never again have such good seats as these. The recording scene of "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For" with a gospel choir from Harlem was spine-tingling. There was no filmed connection between U2 and the choir (they were sitting five feet from one another, but may as well have been on Mars) but the talent of the choir made up for that.

There was also a very funny scene with B.B. King as he recorded "When Love Comes to Town" with U2. Bono seemed quite in awe of the legendary Blues guitarist, so it was ironic to hear King tell Bono, "I can't play chords; we'll have to get someone else to play chords." King may not be able to play chords, but he strums a mean blues guitar and he injected some much-needed soul into the song — and the movie.

The moviegoer should be aware of a possible problem in seeing this movie: teenyboppers are flocking to it. They squeal a lot, especially when blond-haired Mullen appears on screen. See this movie at a later showing when it is past the teenyboppers' curfew.

'Pizza' exudes sexuality

By LEONARD ELLIS
Staff Reporter

"Mystic Pizza" heaps three familiar toppings of teenage romance atop a thin dough shell. Instead of the basic cheese pizza, the pie is topped with the sexually aggressive teenager and the best built specimen of the opposite sex, the poor teenager with the rich lover, and the teenager who seeks the love of a married member of the opposite sex.

The "Pizza" is recycled here with boys or men being the target of three teenage girls who work at a parlor called Mystic Pizza.

The sexually aggressive teenager Jojo (Lili Taylor) spends the movie trying to have sex with the hunk Bill (Vincent Phillip D'Onofrio) she froze at the altar. Like every other sexually aggressive

Sponsored by the Office of Music Activities, Villanova University will present the Reading Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Sydney Rothstein. This concert will open a series of cultural events to be offered at Villanova. The concert will take place on Nov. 13 at 8 p.m. in the duPont Pavilion. Tickets are on sale in Connelly Center for $6.

The music will be of a wide variety from the 18th, 19th, and 20th centuries including selections by Mozart, Strauss, Weill, and Copland. Soprano Stephanie Musak will be performing.

The concert is open to the entire Philadelphia area as it is being advertised in local newspapers and college campuses. John Dunphy, director of Music Activities, said the concert will offer Villanova students the opportunity to hear something they may never have experienced before. Aside from local bands and rock concerts, this performance may introduce students to a "whole other world in music," said Dunphy.

For every ticket sold, the Office of Music Activities will donate $1 to any campus organization of the buyer's choice.

The Reading Symphony Orchestra was founded 76 years ago, and is based in Reading. According to a past article from The Philadelphia Inquirer, the symphony is comprised of about 40 percent resident musicians. The remaining players are young, freelance musicians from the Philadelphia area.

Sidney Rothstein has been with the symphony for 13 years. According to the program from the symphony's 75th Anniversary Season, Rothstein was awarded a Doctor of Humanities degree by Albright College and an honorary degree of Doctor of Music by Combs College in Philadelphia. In the past, he has served as associate music director of the Honolulu Symphony Orchestra and music director of both the Charleston Symphony Orchestra in West Virginia and the Florida Symphony Orchestra in Orlando.

Oingo Boingo refutes mass market

By JOHN CARR
Staff Reporter

In the mid-1970s, popular music was dominated by two sorts of theatricality: the synthetic sexuality of disco and the anti-musical posturing of punk. Punk seemed heavily dominated by bands modeling the boorish adolescence of the Ramone clan in raspy contrived Devo-esque manor. In such a context, a group whose members appeared dressed in Oxford shirts and stood poker straight as they performed — a group such as Oingo Boingo, the eight-piece L.A. outfit with a three-man horn section — was both a refutation of the mass market pop-synthetic disco sound and an answer to the overexaggerated subjectivity that burdened many new bands such as XTC.

In 1980, Oingo Boingo released the first four-song EP of their career under IRS Records. Since its inception, the band had been billed as a new-wave brassy sound on the cutting edge of synth-funk. The EP received a less than warm welcome from critics who described it as a subtle, succinct effort hidden behind overproduction and hamminess. Danny Elfman (lead vocals) was instantly recognized as a clever artist, but was dismissed as lacking focus or vision to overcome his grandiose theatrical instincts.

Immediately following the release of the E.P., Oingo Boingo underwent changes in their musical style and direction. They also changed labels to Little Maestro and soon released their first full length LP, titled Only A Lad. The title track hit dance clubs all across the country and Oingo Boingo became a successful pressurized dance rock group, new-wave, streamlined into a power-driven attack.

Although the remainder of the album sounded trite and contrived, stealing bits from The Tubes and Devo, critics began to agree Oingo Boingo had indeed developed more insight and direction since its last effort. "On the Outside" was released as a single and fared above average in America's music market. As more syntho-pop, new wave bands exploded on the scene, such as Blondie, Talking Heads, and Brian Eno, Oingo Boingo became overshadowed and talk about the sheer genius of Danny Elfman was transposed into ravings about David Byrne.

Once again, the band underwent personality changes and musical direction; since its inception there had been constant quarrels about musical input, creativity, attention and power. But, the common desire to achieve success, among all its members, kept Oingo Boingo a thriving force. After another change in record companies, this time to A&M, Oingo Boingo finally released an album destined to receive recognition.

When not pushing the crisp basal role and pressurized dance music, Oingo Boingo reverted back to their previously established style, only lighter, with horns playing it subtle, rather than a thin brassiness. "Grey Matter" and "Nothing to Fear But Fear Itself" are filled with stiff drumming and ricocheting polyrhythms. Ringing guitars, playful horns, and bright, brilliant choral ensembles offered a crisp, polished cleanliness that had long been discarded from Oingo Boingo's repertoire.

Finally, with a welcomed album under their belts, Oingo Boingo had proven themselves to be a driving force in new wave music and one of America's most innovative and conceptually artistic rock groups.

The follow-up album to Nothing to Fear titled Good For Your Soul was released in 1983. "Wake Up" and "Who Do You Want To Be" were two of the most invigorating cuts on the album. Full of bare jarring chords and tight lyrical structure, they were emotionally brighter and musically fuller.

Perhaps Oingo Boingo's most widely known LP, Dean Man's Party, released under MCA label after a short metamorphic phase, skyrocketed the band to their present day avante-garde status. With the pulsating beat of the title track, its blaring horns and syntho-pop melody, Oingo Boingo once again topped the dance charts across the country. With a cameo appearance in Rodney Dangerfield's "Back to School," it seemed as if this band had indeed reached the winning side.

Oingo Boingo's last album, BOI-NGO, was more similar to their original musical direction and conceptual effort. Perhaps somewhat overshadowed by Dead Man's Party, BOI-NGO, released in 1986, contained what critics dubbed.

Since the 1986 album, Danny Elfman has released his own album titled So-lo. Although five of the members of Oingo Boingo do appear on the album, it was a chance for Elfman to experiment in a different musical arena. Aside from his solo album, Elfman also began composing for movie soundtracks. Most recently, in "Beetlejuice," Elfman combined circus-like organs with ludicrously creepy noises to produce a fulfilled, unpredictable instrumental experience.

Now, in 1988, Oingo-Boingo has released its first anthology of music. Spanning a decade of musical fluctuation and ingenuity, the new album BOINGO — A LIVE CELEBRATION OF A DECADE 1979-88, contains their most impressive influential cuts and musical endeavors. Because the album is a live album recorded at one time, a production technique not found on many live albums, which usually recorded over long tours and contain the best performance of each individual song, fans may find Danny Elfman's vocals a bit strained and the orchestration of many of the songs slightly varied from previous album releases.

For those who are interested in discovering Oingo Boingo, this anthology offers a diversified collection of the bands best endeavors. Included in the double LP are two new songs, "Cinderella Undercover" and "Winning Side." The new sound is more relaxed, natural and comfortable, indicating that the band has returned from their minimal retreat ready for action and new studio experimentation. Oingo Boingo has been around for over a decade and sounds more determined to stretch into a new generation.

'Pizza'

teen movie, the aggressor tries unrelentingly to conquer the most chaste opposite. Here, Lili sets traps in her parents house, her sister's apartment and the Ladies room at the pizza parlor.

In "Pizza," Bill is adored by Lili for his wrists. Since a wrist fetish is not the basis of a strong relationship, Bill and Lili have some problems until Lili recognizes Bill's non-physical qualities.

The second couple features poor Daisy (Julia Roberts) and rich Charles. Daisy is the shapely pizza passer whose slattern heels and skirt introduce her to us. Charles is the lazy law school drop out son of rich and demanding parents. His life needs direction and worth.

The third subplot finds Daisy's sister, an otherwise intelligent teenager named Kat (Annabeth Gish), falling in love with a married architect and father of one, a girl. Despite efforts to make Kat intelligent, the architect sensitive, their activities enlightening, and their sex discreet, this story matches male Oedipal relationships in "Cocktail" (1988), "My Tutor" (1983) and "Private School" (1983) for fantasy. Of the three "Pizza" plots, the younger-older tale is the dullest and least believable.

"Pizza" nurtures the waxing star of Vincent D'Onofrio.

Gifted with height and a facile mind and face. D'Onofrio is comfortable when the camera lingers on him. It is a compliment to say that D'Onofrio can act in slow motion. He does so here as the simple lobsterman confronting Lili's wild urges and rejudging his own ideals in women and marriage.

Mystic Pizza serves three common toppings on a thin shell in a picturesque locale. It scores for service and atmosphere, but loses in food quality.

Although movie industry executives thought that 1988 would be another record-breaking year, this fall's dismal box-office performance has killed any chance for setting a new record. The absence of a mega-hit like last year's "Fatal Attraction" or 1986's " 'Crocodile' Dundee" has kept movie goers at home — last weekend marketed the ninth consecutive decline in movie attendance this fall.

However, horror/science-fiction films are still doing big business, led by "A Nightmare on Elm Street, Part 4," which grossed over $40 million during August and September. Another sequel, "Halloween IV," was the number one movie in the nation for two weeks in a row, even though it was so bad that John Carpenter, the creator and director of the classic 1978 original, refused to be associated with it. Carpenter's latest, "They Live," an alien story with ex-wrestler Roddy Piper, was the top movie last weekend. In addition, "Alien Nation," with James Caan battling alien invaders, has been strong over the past month.

Rounding out the top five last week were the concert film "U2: Rattle and Hum"; "Everybody's All-American," with Dennis Quaid and Jessica Lange; Leonard Nimoy's "The Good Mother," starring Diane Keaton and "The Accused," the Kelly McGillis-Jodie Foster courtroom drama.

Despite the poor fall earnings, Hollywood has high hopes for the lucrative Christmas season: coming up in the next month are "Twins," with Danny DeVito and Arnold Schwarzenegger; Dustin Hoffman and Tom Cruise in the drama "Rain Man" and "Scrooged," an update on "A Christmas Carol" starring Bill Murray.

RATINGS RACE: As expected, NBC has taken an early lead in this season's ratings battle. On the strength of its returning series, last season's No. 1 network holds a commanding lead over second-place ABC. Meanwhile, CBS is continuing to fall further and further behind.

Another similarity to last year: the failure of new shows to find large audiences. ABC's "Roseanne" is a certified Top 10 hit and NBC's "Empty Nest" and "Dear John" are also doing well, but the latter two are losing a considerable number of viewers from their lead-ins ("The Golden Girls" and "Cheers," respectively). Among the Nielsen losers so far are "The Van Dyke Show," "Annie McGuire" and "Paradise" on CBS; "Police Story" and "Incredible Sunday" on ABC and NBC's "Something is Out There."

As for returning shows, NBC's once-invincible Thursday night lineup is suffering a slow, but steady ratings decline, mostly because of a weakening "Cosby Show." "Family Ties," on Sunday nights, is also losing viewers, but NBC can take heart on Mondays, where "ALF" and "The Hogans" are clobbering the "Newhart". "Coming of Age" tandem on CBS. Most of ABC's returning series are still young and remain in good shape, holding steady or improving on last season's numbers. The one exception is "Dynasty," which is dying in its new time slot on Thursdays.

A SHOW FOR WANDA: Jamie Lee Curtis found work early in her career by starring in a number of slasher movies, like "Halloween," "Prom Night" and "Terror Train." But with the success of this summer's "A Fish Called Wanda," Curtis drew raves for her surprisingly funny performance and proved that she is capable of more than playing helpless victims.

Now, ABC has plans to capitalize on her new-found popularity with the romantic comedy "Anything But Love," which has been on the network's shelf for the past year, but is being dusted off as a midseason replacement series. Curtis plays a magazine writer with two love interests: a lawyer, played by frequent "Letterman" comedian Richard Lewis, and her new co-worker (D.W. Moffett), who also happens to be her ex-boyfriend.

ABC has ordered six episodes of "Love," which will air sometime next spring.

SHORT TAKES: Academy Award-winner Michael Douglas is reuniting with his "Romancing the Stone" co-stars Kathleen Turner and DeVito for a new comedy, "The War of the Roses." DeVito will direct ... CBS has decided not to film 13 new episodes of the critically acclaimed "Frank's Place" for later this year. Reason: incredibly low ratings during the summer months ... Fox's season premiere of "21 Jump Street" destroyed NBC's "Magical World of Disney" in last week's Nielsen numbers and set a new ratings record for the series. "Married ... With Children" also set a personal-best ... ABC's 30-hour mega-series "War and Remembrance," the sequel to 1983's "Winds of War," will air its first 18 hours this month, starting Sunday. NBC's answer to this potential hit: "The Goddess of Love," a TV movie-starring Vanna White.

Pop stars sing Disney

By BILL CARR
and MICHAEL AIMETTE

FOR WHAT IT'S WORTH

Stay Awake is the title of one of the most curious albums you are ever likely to hear, a collection of new interpretations of classic Disney tunes — performed by the most unlikely cast of pop musicians ever.

Record producer Hal Willner is the mastermind behind this brilliant idea, mixing whimsical cartoon songs with modern rock and roll performers. Sinead O'Connor, James Taylor, The Replacements, Los Lobos and over 20 other musicians re-interpret songs from Walt Disney's most famous movies, including Snow White, Pinocchio, Bambi and Peter Pan.

Usually the idea works: Bonnie Raitt and Was (Not Was) performing "Baby Mine" from Dumbo is simply brilliant — it is a typically blissful Disney classic enhanced by the talents of modern musicians. The same for Sinead O'Connor's version of "Someday My Prince Will Come," which is perhaps the prettiest singing she has ever done.

Sometimes, however, the idea flops: Aaron Neville singing the "Mickey Mouse March" really stinks — no matter who sang the song, it would sound goofy (pardon the pun) and forced. Other times, the results are disappointing. "Little April Shower" by Natalie Merchant and Michael Stipe is rather boring and muddled, while "Stay Awake," by Suzanne Vega, has an all-too-appropriate title.

The good certainly outweighs the bad on Stay Awake though. The artists redoing the songs deserve a great deal of credit; remember these songs were meant to be simple songs for children. Also, most listeners already know the originals; for instance, many people will hate Tom Waits' "Heigh Ho," since it bears little resemblance to the original tune. Ringo Starr's obvious contribution, "When You Wish Upon A Star," is reason in itself for buying the album — his carefree attitude is typical of the album's lofty intentions.

At least no one can accuse Billy Bragg of selling out

PLAYTIME FOR BRAGG: Billy Bragg, the working class musician, has composed another literate, emotionally charged album in Worker's Playtime. Bragg's fourth album does not deviate greatly in theme or content from Talking With The Taxman About Poetry, his previous LP; the material is strong, but not much new ground has been broken.

Bragg is often labeled "political" and "socialist", and though these tags are undeniable (the album's cover features a gathering of proletariat Maoist revolutionaries and the epithet, "Capitalism is killing music"), but Bragg's main musical focus is relationships. Relationships among the working class, yes, but relationships. Bragg is one of the best in the business on the topic. Listen to "Must I Paint You a Picture" and "The Price I Pay."

Continuing his welcome progression towards broader instrumentation, Bragg actually has something resembling a band on Worker's Problem, and the arrangements are often stirring and beautiful. True, Bragg's harsh cockney drawl can grate on one's ears after extended listening, but the message here is all heartfelt. At least no one can accuse Billy Bragg of selling out.

BOINGO COMES ALIVE: To commemorate their 10th anniversary in the music biz, Oingo Boingo has released a two-record live (but not concert) album called Boingo Alive, A Celebration of a Decade. Keeping in character with the band itself, the album is an eclectic sampling of Boingo's six-and-a-half album career; along with the expected singles, the album contains several previously unrecorded songs and other rarities.

People tend either to love or to hate Oingo Boingo. Decide for yourself. Whatever you decide though, Boingo Alive should be a very interesting album because Boingo, is first and foremost, a live band. For example, Boingo has never had huge commercial success, but for years they have been one of Southern California's favorite bands, largely because of their kinetic, frenzied live performances. This is the first chance listeners have to experience Boingo's live explosiveness in the comfort of their own homes.

David Drew, Danzig disappoint fans

David Drew
Safety Love
MCA Records

Imagine, if you can, a "musical marriage" of sorts between Peter Gabriel singing "D.I.Y." and Billy Idol screaming "Rebel Yell," and you get David Drew, MCA Records' newest hard rock power.

Besides his most unusual voice, Drew has had the unfortunate consequence of arriving on the scene at a time when hard rock bands are a dime a dozen, and when it is nearly impossible to distinguish among the masses below the mega-giants like Def Leppard and Van Halen. On his debut effort, Drew does very little to differentiate himself from the prototypical hard rock stereotype.

On his debut effort, Drew does very little to differentiate himself from the prototypical hard rock stereotype

The album opens with the title track, "Safety Love," which consists of a pulse-pounding keyboard line and droningly repetitive lyrics. "Green Eyed Lady" is the only song of any value on the whole album, in part because Drew succeeds in mixing all of the instruments along with his voice, with no individual part overpowering another.

Musically, the album is not all that bad; the keyboards, bass, and guitar are strong, and the drumming is adequate, but together with Drew's somewhat irritating voice and shallow lyrics, the album succeeds only in being boring and repetitive. Drew's problem may lie with the fact that he plays all of the instruments, as well as singing leads, which might be the cause of the repetitiveness in his music.

He might benefit from the input of others on future albums in instrumental and songwriting areas. Heaping all of the responsibility on one man leads to one-dimensional music, something Drew's debut album is suffering from rather acutely.

Danzig
Danzig
Def American Recordings

Not to be blunt, but this album is just plain boring. The first release from former Misfit Glenn Danzig's self-named band is not a bad album, just lacking anything that distinguishes it above any other mediocre heavy metal release this year. And it is just that — heavy metal.

Glenn Danzig and the Misfits made a real mark in the late 1970s by combining the typically demented lyrics of heavy metal with adrenalin-packed punk music. The problem with Danzig is, that while Glenn Danzig's lyric writing is still very similar, the music has lost its punch. As a result, the songs are tiresome and tend to run together.

The opening track, "Twist of Cain," is a good example of this mediocrity. Danzig's competent lyrics are spoiled by the same guitar riff being played over and over again, until the listener is ready to throw rocks at the stereo. While musicians Eerie Von (base), John Christ (guitar), and Chuck Biscuits (drums) are decent musicians, Glenn Danzig's music writing skills are way behind his lyric writing abilities.

About the only interesting track on the whole album is "The Hunter," only because it bears a striking resemblance to Led Zeppelin's "How Many More Times." Still, Glenn Danzig gets the writing credit. All in all, this album is a grave disappointment. It would be to Glenn Danzig's advantage to stick to writing lyrics and leave the music to someone else and it would be to the listener's advantage to go out and buy a Misfits record instead.

Money For Nothing
Dire Straits
Warner Brothers
½

Money For Nothing is the name of the newly released best-of album from the now-defunct Dire Straits. For the most part, it is a pretty good release as well. While so many other best-of collections are disappointing, this one is successful in that the songs were intelligently chosen and offer a nice chronicle of the career of one of the better rock and roll bands of the late 70s and 80s.

The package offers only Dire Straits' finest material.

The package offers only Dire Straits' finest material. Although not chronologically ordered, the album does open with "Sultans of Swing" and "Down to the Waterline," two tracks from Dire Straits' self-titled 1978 debut. Major points of interest include a live version of "Portobello Belle" from 1983's live Alchemy and a remix of the now classic "Twisting By the Pool." Aside from two songs from 1980's Making Movies and three from Brothers in Arms, the band's last album, the rest of the album consists of one song from each of the band's other albums.

There are only two problems with this album. First of all, the fact that anyone could compile a Dire Straits collection and exclude "Skateaway" is unbelievable. That was an unwise omission that otherwise would have made this album perfect. The only other mistake was the title, the name of a very successful song, but not one that was indicative of the work of a band that is sorely missed.

Keaton changes in 'The Good Mother'

By DINA INNELLA

"The Good Mother"
Directed by Leonard Nimoy
Touchstone Pictures
½

Anna Dunlap wants to be a good mother and a good lover. She is at a point in her life where these two things are extremely important to her. Now she risks losing them both, and society treats her as if that were something out of the ordinary. Adapted from the novel by Sue Miller, "The Good Mother" studies this serious subject closely.

The sexual awareness of little Molly prompts her father to sue for custody and a battle ensues.

Dunlap, played by Diane Keaton, is a divorced mother who is a lab technician and a piano teacher. Her early life was repressed and as a result, she was repressed by her husband; a divorce soon followed. We learn this information from the onset. The divorce was amicable and she kept custody of Molly, played by Asia Vieira. Knowing about Dunlap's past, we understand why she wants her daughter to learn about sex at such an early age.

Dunlap's life is basically stable until she meets and falls in love with Leo Cutter, played by Liam Neeson. Cutter is an Irish, modern sculptor who teaches her about love. The relationship flourishes and Cutter innocently becomes great friends with Molly. He eventually moves in with Dunlap, and Molly is well aware of the relationship between Cutter and her mother.

This union opens up a whole new world for Dunlap and she becomes a freer and a happier person because of it. She easily adapts to this new lifestyle, as does Molly.

The sexual awareness of little Molly prompts her father to sue for custody, and a battle ensues. Dunlap, has to make an important decision. It becomes an issue of what she will do about her situation and what her strategy will be. She is torn between wanting to get her daughter back no matter what her testimony is in court, and standing up for what she really believes.

Diane Keaton gives a gripping performance as Anna Dunlap. We become part of her and feel what she feels throughout the movie. She changes right before our eyes, from a closed, inward person to a more open, loving human being. We are happy when she finds happiness, and we empathize with her when she must fight to get her child back.

Liam Neeson is excellent playing Leo Cutter. The way he teaches Dunlap about love and life is exhilarating, and the way he tenderly treats Molly is completely believable.

Scenes with Dunlap's grandparents, played by Ralph Bellamy and Teresa Wright, and lawyer, played by Jason Robards, were also memorable.

"The Good Mother" leaves the audience to ponder what they would do, not only in Dunlap's position, but in the father's position. The movie makes you think what would have happened if the situation were handled differently.

Most of all, "The Good Mother" forces us to reflect how we have been raised and how we will raise our own children, and what values we as parents will try to impose on them.

No matter how great the material desires may be, I want to be with you and my loved ones in your perpetual glory. Amen, Thank you for your love towards me and my loved ones.

Persons must pray this prayer three consecutive days without asking your wish. After the third day your wish will be granted no matter how difficult it may be, then promise to publish this dialogue as soon as your favor has been granted. Thank you.

Men's volleyball faces nation's best

By ANDREW BULLION
Staff Reporter

The Villanova men's volleyball team was eliminated in the quarterfinals of Indiana University at Pennsylvania's (I.U.P.) volleyball tournament, Nov. 5. The Wildcats took third in their division in pool-play to advance to the playoffs, before losing their playoff match with Edinborough University.

Villanova first played Penn State University, the No. 2 volleyball team in the country last year. Penn State's 6-foot-10 senior middle-hitter Chris Chase, arguably the best big man in the world, was totally unstoppable in the middle.

His spikes of over 100 mph. ripped through an undersized Villanova front line and overwhelmed the 'Nova defense. The Wildcats, though gaining an early lead on the Nittany Lions, were simply outmatched as Penn State beat Villanova 15-7, 15-5.

Villanova's next pool-play opponent was tournament host Indiana University at Pennsylvania. The I.U.P. Indians were ranked ninth nationally last year among all club volleyball teams, and had amassed an impressive 126-23 record over the last seven seasons.

Villanova fell behind I.U.P. early, but the tenacious 'Cats came from behind to beat the Indians 15-12 in the first game.

"I think we played to the level of our competition; I think we played well."

- Head Coach Tom Lowy

The key to 'Nova's comeback was the excellent setting of co-captain Mike Dolan, who has proved to be Villanova's most valuable asset. "I.U.P. played really tough defense, but we ran a really good offense that game," Dolan said.

In their second game against the Indians, Villanova initially squandered an 8-2 lead to actually fall behind 8-9, but Wildcat senior outside hitter John Constantakis took over for the Cats. Set after set turned into a Constantakis kill, and it was behind his dominating hitting, and again Dolan's setting, that Villanova held on to win this crucial game 15-10, and eliminate home team I.U.P.

"Nappy [Constantakis] played especially well," remarked Dolan.

In their final pool-play match Villanova faced a George Mason University squad that boasted Honduran National Team member Uvaldo Acosto, one of the world's best spikers. George Mason was ranked fifth in the country last year.

As both Mason and 'Nova had already qualified for the playoffs, this match was more symbolic than necessary. George Mason totally dominated the listless Cats, and Acosto seemed to really enjoy rocketing balls off of the Villanova players.

After one particularly hard smash, Acosto sent the ball rebounding off of the chest of Villanova's 6-foot-3 freshman Ivan Kamin, which then sailed over 60 feet to strike a wall on the opposite end of the gym.

One of the few highlights on Villanova's side was 'Nova sophomore Ron Coffey's similar, but less spectacular treatment of George Mason's setter, applying a "Vick's" (smash to the chest). Said Coffey on the Mason match, "I guess it was a good learning experience."

Villanova soon emptied its bench to allow its recruits a chance to compete against some of the world's best. George Mason easily defeated Villanova 15-3, 15-6.

In their quarter-final match Villanova ran up against big-hitting Edinborough University, who had won I.U.P.'s tournament last year (defeating Villanova in the process), and looked even better this year. Most of this match was dead even, but Edinborough's more consistent hitting was their key to victory.

Villanova's setting was far superior, as was their serving, most notably senior outside hitter Brian Good's hard jump serves. But Villanova, having come through a much tougher bracket to qualify for the quarterfinals, simply could not match Edinborough spike for spike.

Edinborough eliminated 'Nova 15-12, 15-11. Good said he was "disappointed we lost, but we'll beat [Edinborough] next time we play them, no doubt."

This "Best of the East" preseason volleyball tournament was held by I.U.P. as a fundraiser whose proceeds were to benefit their local Big Brothers/Big Sisters chapter.

Villanova Head Coach Tom Lowy said, "I think we played to the level of our competition; I think we played well."

Already it is evident that this is Villanova's strongest squad in years, and the Wildcats are sure to come out swinging for their season opener against cross-town rival University of Pennsylvania on Feb. 7.

The soccer team's season ended last Wednesday when 'Nova tied Drexel, 4-4.

Soccer closes campaign, Klos ends illustrious career

By JOE GUARINO
Assistant Sports Editor

The Wildcat men's soccer team closed out its 1988 campaign with a 4-4 tie against Soccer 7 foe Drexel.

Senior co-captain and record-setting goalie Ron Klos started the game, before yielding the net to his heir apparent, sophomore Mark Shumaker, with five minutes elapsed. This is a part of team tradition.

Freshman standout Rich Maue scored twice and sophomore Joe Koziol once — as the Villanova offense exploded to a 3-0 lead, near the middle of the first half.

The Dragons came storming back to tie the score at 3-3, and sent the game into overtime. Then, with just 53 seconds gone in the first 10-minute overtime period, Dragon Steve Keppler tallied a goal to give his team the lead, 4-3.

With just eight minutes left in the final overtime period, Shumaker went down to injury and forced Klos to return to the field for a curtain call. He kept the net empty for the final moments of his career. The game ended in a 4-4 stalemate.

Klos finished his career with a record-setting 15 shutouts. This is four better than the previous best.

Freshmen Maue and Steve Raffellini completed their first seasons tied for the team lead in scoring with 10 points each. Maue had five goals, while Raffellini accumulated four goals and two assists.

Nearly all of the Wildcat starters will be returning next year. These players will return with another year's experience, probably bringing added success.

Villanova finished the season at 6-9-2 overall. They compiled records of 1-3-2 and 1-3 in the Philadelphia Soccer 7 and the Big East, respectively.

'Nova starts season strong drowns Michigan, Georgetown

By CATHY MARTIN
Staff Reporter

The Villanova women's swimming team opened their season this past weekend on Nov. 5-6 in stunning fashion. In a triple meet, which was held at duPont, the Wildcats trounced Eastern Michigan 152-136 and destroyed Georgetown 172-118.

Coach Chuck Horton said that he was pleased with the girl's performances. "The way they pulled together for the first meet was fantastic. They have been training hard and their times show it."

Their times were impressive. Laurel Fourier, last year's Big East Swimmer of the Year, proved she was ready for another year of success. Fourier not only won the 50-meter freestyle (24.53) and the 100 freestyle (53.02), but she also won the 200 freestyle, in which she set the new pool record with a time of 1:53.89.

More strong swimming came from Teri Messenger and Megan Waters, who finished first and second respectively in the 100 backstroke (1:01.78 and 1:02.83) and the 200 backstroke (2:11.91 and 2:17.01). Messenger also won the 100 butterfly with a time of 1:00.37.

Also capturing victories were Mary Mayfield in the 100 breaststroke (1:08.49), and Mindy Warmbrand who took the 200 butterfly with a time of 2:14.29.

The Wildcats were able to sweep the 200 breaststroke event. Mayfield, Sue Schroder and Laura Carasso placed first, second and third. Their times were 2:28.73, 2:33.17 and 2:36.02, respectively.

The quality swimming of freshmen Christy Bridgewater and Eileen Consadine made obvious the reason for their recuitment. Bridgewater finished first in the 1000 freestyle (10:29.87), 500 freestyle (5:08.21), and the 200 individual medley (2:14.97)

Consadine finished second in her three races, losing only to Fournier each time. Her times were a very respectable 24.87 for the 50 freestyle, 53.64 in the 100 freestyle and 1:55.07 in the 200 freestyle.

The performance of these two young swimmers not only helped 'Nova win on Saturday, but apparently assured that the women's swim team will be a strong force in the seasons to come.

The meet was an even greater success as the Cats finished first and second in the two relays. In the 200 medley relay, the team of Waters, Mayfield, Messenger and Fournier finished on top with a winning time of 1:52.77. Second place, with a time of 1:56.20, went to Eileen McCaffrey, Schroder, Warmbrand and Tina Louwers.

The 400 freestyle relay winners were Mayfield, Beth Capobianco, Bridgewater and Consadine (3:41.83). The next finishers were Waters, McCafferty, Geraldine Cortes and Louwers. Their time was 3:46.03.

If this meet is any indication of what is to come for the Villanova women's swimming team, then there are many reasons to be excited about the future.

Their next meet, which will be held at duPont, is on Nov. 11 at 3 p.m. against George Washington University.

Athlete of the Week

Ann Beirne

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is women's soccer captain Ann Beirne.

Beirne led the team to a 6-0 victory over LaSalle, Nov. 1, with two goals and two assists to end the season and her brilliant career.

Beirne made her name known as one of the dominant players in the country by twice being selected to the All-Northeast Region team.

Beirne finished her career with 25 goals and 11 assists.

Women split pair

By MONICA BYRNE
Staff Reporter

Looking for a strong finish, the women's volleyball team is playing some of the best ball of its season. With only one more tournament left before the Big East Tourney, 'Nova stands 11-20.

On Nov. 4, the Cats pounced on the Seton Hall Pirates for the third time this year. Playing her "best match of the season," according to Head Coach David Barkley, senior co-captain Debbie Opitz led the team to its 3-0 victory (15-9, 17-15, 15-10), with an outstanding .407 hitting percentage and 11 digs.

Barkley felt his team "stayed aggressive and played with a lot of confidence." Since his team was "in control most of the time," the question was not "if we would win, but more, by how much."

The next day the Cats hosted the Georgetown Hoyas, whom they "extended to their limits, playing two really superb games." Playing without the talents of started Jill Beiter, due to an injury, 'Nova attacked for five games, but could not make the kill.

The Hoyas edged the Cats (16-14, 6-15, 15-9, 1-15, 7-15), despite the efforts of senior co-captain, Karen Fraser (16 kills) and Sheila Duffy, (14 kills, .414 hitting percentage). Barkley felt Duffy played "her best game by far." He added, "usually when you hit .242 as a team, you win, but they (Georgetown) hit .305."

Barkley was pleased with the efforts of Hillary Anderson, who showed tremendous endurance, playing two solid games back to back. He was also happy with the performance of Patty Duane, who filled in for Beiter, leading the team in blocking.

Today, 'Nova is off to Rutgers for a tournament against Rutgers, Virginia, Northeastern and UMBC. Barkley seems optimistic and feels that it is possible for his team to "take the tourney if we play anything like we have in our last two matches."

Bob Ward came up with a hat-trick in the Ice Cat's victory over Scranton last Saturday.

Ice hockey

By WAYNE CRESSKILL
Staff Reporter

November is upon us once again and that means that Villanova's beloved Ice Cats are back. This year the Villanova hockey team is off to an impressive 2-1 start. Their latest win came last Saturday when 'Nova triumphed over their Pennsylvania rival Scranton.

Leading the Cats was last year's leading scorer, junior Bob Ward, and freshman Hugh Maginnis. Both Ward and Maginnis tallied hat tricks in the Ice Cats win.

Also netting goals for the Wildcats were Mark Bruno, Bill Austin, Mark Neaves and Tommy Dillon. Starting goalie Mitch Doren blocked 23 shots on goal in 40 minutes of play. Doren's replacement Jimmy Clark went the rest of the way stopping eight shots.

This victory gave the Cats a 1-0 record in the ECAC. Their tough conference schedule will continue next week when they travel to do battle with Skidmore on Nov. 12, and St. Michaels on Nov. 13.

Football loses big

To Schulz's defense, the major reason for his subpar performance was the fact that V.U. was playing catch-up ball all afternoon. "We abandoned our game plan when it was 24-7," Talley said. "We started throwing the football and they teed off on him. They knew exactly what we were going to do and stayed in pass coverage the rest of the game."

The loss drops 'Nova to 4-2 in the Yankee Conference, but the Wildcats were able to keep pace with first-place Delaware (5-2, 4-2), who also lost. The U. Conn. Huskies helped V.U. out by defeating the Blue Hens 21-20.

Though a victory would have given Villanova sole possession of first in the conference, Talley and the Cats looked at the Delaware loss from another perspective. "After we got beat like that, it didn't make it any more disappointing," Talley said. "We looked at it from the point of view that we still have a chance at the title."

'Nova has two remaining game, both conference matches, and has to win each one to have a legitimate shot at the title. The Wildcats travel to Massachussets this Saturday to play what Talley describes as a "do-or-die" game against the Minutemen (4-2, 6-3).

"This contest is an elimination game because the winner continues to go on for a shot at the title. The loser will not have a chance at a piece of the conference championship."

Hockey shocked

By AMY C. SPENCER
Assistant Sports Editor

Last weekend, the Villanova women's field hockey team made their first appearance in post-season play since the team was elevated to Division I status in 1984.

Head Coach Cheryl Massaro was proud that the Cats were to be named as one of the country's top teams. "My goal as coach has been to establish that Villanova has a consistently strong team, and I believe that we've begun to show the rest of the nation that we're a team to be dealt with. Our progress speaks for itself."

Their debut, however, was not the most auspicious, with the Wildcats falling to Dartmouth in the first round of the ECAC Tournament held Nov. 5-6 in Providence, RI.

It appeared as though the Wildcat team was on their way to a rout of the Big Green, when junior Tory Rife took control of the ball and pounded it into the Dartmouth net with just 40 seconds elapsed in the match.

The game was marked by strong play by both teams, and the half ended with Villanova on top 1-0.

The Wildcats retained their lead well into the second half, until Dartmouth was allowed a penalty stroke with 7:24 remaining. The Big Green was able to convert the shot to tie the game.

The fans in attendance were on the edge of their seats as the final seconds ticked away to what seemed like an inevitable overtime period.

But the Big Green managed to pull a penalty shot with only 40 seconds left in the contest. The Dartmouth player stroked the ball and sent it skimming through the Villanova defense.

The ball slammed into the Villanova goal, dashing any hopes of post-season glory for the Wildcats.

Men's swimming routs Georgetown

By STEVE KIRSCH
Staff Reporter

The Wildcat men's swimming and diving team recorded their first Big East victory of the year, defeating Georgetown at duPont Pavilion on Nov. 5, 143-90. The 'Nova men routed the Hoyas, winning all 13 events as they did against American University, and are now 2-0 overall. The Cats were led by senior Chris Craft, who was victorious in three races.

Craft, seniors Tim Truax and Blaise Matthews, and freshman Jim Mackey, won the opening event of the day, the 400-meter medley relay. Craft, Truax, Matthews and Mackey finished the relay in 3:36.65.

Craft also claimed later victories in the 200 individual medley and the 200 butterfly in times of 1:58.01 and 1:54.67, respectively.

Also winning three events was junior Lou Dearstyne. Dearstyne won the 200 freestyle in 1:41.32 and the 100 freestyle in 46.57. In the final event of the afternoon, Dearstyne, sophomore Steve Petrie, freshman Jerry O'Mara and Mackey teamed up to win the 400 freestyle relay in 3:12.98.

Freshman Russ Stockman won the 1000 freestyle in a time of 9:49.62 and O'Mara added to his winning leg in the 400 freestyle relay with a victory in the 50 freestyle in a time of 21.70.

Sophomores Ray Hyer and Eric Haner each came away with victories in the diving events on Saturday. Hyer won the 1-meter diving with a score of 217.70 and Haner won the 3-meter event with a total of 226 points.

Stockman added a win in the 500 freestyle event to his earlier 1000 freestyle victory in a time of 4:46.29. Truax also came back from the 400 medley relay victory to win the 200 breaststroke in 2:15.68.

The Cats face off at duPont Pavilion on Nov. 11 with George Washington and Nov. 12 with Boston University in two more non-league contests. With back to back "shutout" wins against American and Georgetown, the 'Nova men will look to continue their recent success this weekend.

U.N.H rolls past Cats, 58-7

By JOHN G. RICCO
Sports Editor

For those V.U. fans who heard the score and thought it was an error, or read it and thought it was a misprint, make no mistake, the final score last Saturday was: New Hampshire 58, Villanova 7.

Prior to the contest, however, all signs pointed to quite a different outcome.

'Nova was 5-2-1 and in the thick of the Yankee Conference race. New Hampshire, on the other hand, had lost four of its last five games, and was fading fast at 4-4.

Though V.U. Head Coach Andy Talley knew U.N.H. was better than its record indicated, he and his staff had a hard time convincing his players so. "Our players came into the game not looking at them as seriously as they should have," Talley said. "As a coaching staff you can only forewarn so much.

"I don't think mentally our players approached this game with the maturity that I had expected."

Even if the squad had been mentally ready, though, it is doubtful they could have defeated U.N.H. last week. The Wildcats (of New Hampshire) played a nearly flawless game in upping their record to 5-4.

Senior quarterback Bob Jean completed 27-45 passes for 486 yards and two TD's, as U.N.H. rolled up an amazing 708 yards against V.U. "We would have had to play them on our best day to beat that team," Talley said. "They looked magnificent to me, they had no weaknesses."

The U.N.H. performance drew raves, not only from Talley, but from coaches around the conference. "Bobby Jean played one of the finest games I've seen a quarterback play in my 14 years as a coach," U. Mass Head Coach Jim Reid said. "He was hot! He was on, and I don't think you can have an effective defense against a quarterback when he's like that."

New Hampshire got out of the gates quickly taking a 17-0 lead after one period. 'Nova answered with a Kirk Schulz to Bobby Brady six-yard touchdown pass early in the second quarter, but U.N.H. put the game away with two more scores in the period giving them a commanding 31-7 halftime lead.

Two of New Hampshires first-half scores came on touchdown passes of 62 and 64 yards from Jean to flanker Chris Braune. Braune finished the day with four catches for 142 yards.

U.N.H. was not only successful through the air, but dominated on the ground as well. Tailback Norm Ford's 152 yards on 22 carries vaulted him past V.U. tailback Jeff Dingle and into the lead in Yankee Conference rushing with 776 yards.

"Every now and then you have those types of games were everything goes right for you," remarked U.N.H. Head Coach Bill Bowes. "We just played well on both sides of the line. We went out and played certainly our best game of the year."

With the Wildcats enjoying such a successful outing, they needed no additional help, but V.U. decided to provide some anyway. This help came in the form of eight turnovers, five on interceptions by Schulz.

"If you play a team that's hot and give them the ball eight more times, it could be "dial-a-score," Talley said. "And that's exactly what it was on Saturday."

Soccer triumphs 6-0

Paced by senior captain Ann Beirne, the Wildcat women's soccer team trounced visiting La Salle to complete their 1988 season with a resounding 6-0 victory. Beirne, who led the team with two goals and two assists, was credited with her first assist when she fed senior Jean Hajjar with just 2:30 elapsed in the first period.

She struck again, unassisted at 23:30, then passed off to freshman Tina Conti for the Cats third score of the contest at the 27:19 mark.

'Nova stormed into the second period as freshman Betsy Clement and sophomore Beth McMahon each racked up one goal before Beirne closed out the scoring with 13:50 left in the match. The sluggish La Salle squad could only muster four shots on goal, a figure which paled in comparison to the Wildcats' 28.

Goaltender Karen Del Sarto recorded her fifth shutout of the season with three saves on the night.

For seniors Beirne and Hajjar, this was the final match of their collegiate careers. A two-time All-Northeast Region team selection, Beirne closed out a sparkling career with 25 goals and 11 assists, while teammate Hajjar, possessing blazing speed, always kept opponents wary of the Wildcats' offensive power.

When the curtain closed on the season, Hajjar had tallied 37 goals and 16 assists while at 'Nova.

Their ability to outshoot their opponents 262-182, and allow them only 23 goals all season, shows without a doubt that the '88 Cats could take the field with the best and come off victorious.

On the ball

"I went to a fight and a hockey game broke out." This popular one-liner has been used time and time again as a joke about the amount of violence in the sport of hockey. In the NHL this season, however, this joke has seemed to become a larger reality than ever before.

The National Hockey League, an organization that seems to be continuously shooting itself in the foot, is no stranger to scrutiny. In recent history, the word "inept" has become a familiar term used in describing this league.

For evidence, let us look at a couple of incidents that have occurred in the last six months.

New Jersey Devil's coach, Jim Schoenfeld, was suspended for verbally abusing an official in last year's conference final. Schoenfeld was able to receive a court order that permitted him to coach because he did not receive a fair hearing from the league.

The league officials, outraged by this development, refused to officiate the game between the Devils and Boston Bruins. League president John Ziegler was nowhere to be found so three amateur officials, who had some problems standing up on skates, were called in to work the game.

The result was an exhibition that was so pathetic it often resembled a slapstick comedy more than it did an important hockey game. It was a miracle that nobody was hurt. The million-dollar question was: where was Ziegler?

If that was not enough of a farce, an encore was provided shortly thereafter in the Stanley Cup finals between the Bruins and the Edmonton Oilers.

Due to an electrical problem in the Boston Garden, game four was cancelled. The game could have and probably should have been played the next afternoon in Boston. However, due to a silly league bylaw that prohibited a playoff game to be played in the afternoon, game four was moved to Edmonton.

As if the Bruins were not large enough underdogs to begin with, they were forced to play four out of the first five games on the road. Something just does not seem right here.

That brings us to this season. A number of incidents involving excessive violence have occurred already. The unusual nature of these incidents, however, seems to be the number of them that have included the use of a hockey stick as a weapon.

A hockey stick can be a lethal weapon if it is used with malicious intent. Coupled with the fact that most hockey players do not use any form of facial protection, the stakes can be quite high, like losing an eye.

Yet, the NHL seems content with handing out 10 game suspensions to such violators. This is just not enough deterrence.

It is about time that the NHL started taking charge. The nature of hockey makes it a rough sport. That cannot be denied.

If this is not controlled to a reasonable extent by the league, however, who is going to keep it from getting totally out of hand?

A season-long suspension would not be too harsh of a penalty for someone who intentionally guides his stick towards the head of another player.

Unless some drastic action is taken, it wil most likely get much worse before it gets any better. The league just cannot afford much more embarrassment if it expects to survive.

Senate meeting scheduled today

Budget priorities to be released

By DANIEL MORIARTY
Assistant News Editor

The University Senate will vote to accept or reject the 1989-90 budget priorities report of the University planning and priorities committee today at 4 p.m. in the East Lounge of Dougherty Hall.

In addition, the Rev. Edmund J. Dobbin, O.S.A., University president, will address the Senate at the meeting.

The report lists budget priorities using "categories in descending order, i.e., highest [priority], high [priority] and priority. It is important to note, however, that all items listed [regardless of their rank] are priorities and deserve attention and budgetary support."

The priorities accepted by the Senate will serve as criteria by which to judge the proposed budget for next year, which is created by a group of administrators. The Senate budget committee will study the budget next semester and judge how well the proposal has met the priorities.

The budget committee will also make a recommendation to the Senate on whether to accept or reject the proposed budget. The Senate will vote on the budget in the spring. The final decision on the budget is in the hands of the Board of Trustees.

The priorities are split into capital priorities, which "relate to land or buildings but are non-maintenance in nature," and operational priorities, which deal with the University's "ongoing operations," according to the committee's report. They are also divided into short-term and long-term categories.

Items given highest short-term priority by the report include construction of an academic office building, rezoning of west campus for development, completion of program evaluation and planning activities, "continuing improvement" of financial aid for students, maintenance and modernization of physical facilities and a tuition increase at a rate sufficient to maintain the academic quality of Villanova University," according to the report.

Items given highest long-term priority in the report include a

Curran speaks of academic freedom and conscience

By MAUREEN STAPLETON
News Editor

"I think there's an obligation on our part ultimately to prove that academic freedom in Catholic higher education is ultimately good for the Church itself," said the Rev. Charles E. Curran, S.T.D., at his lecture Nov. 13 in Connelly Center.

Curran concluded the lecture, titled "Academic Freedom and Catholic Higher Education," by saying, "In the last analysis, I have followed my conscience, but I also recognize that my conscience might be wrong."

The lecture given to a packed Villanova Room, was interrupted at times by pro-life supporters. Curran holds a controversial view that the life of a fetus does not begin until 14 to 21 days after conception. One man dropped to his knees and began to recite the rosary. Demonstrators were also present in front of Connelly Center, where they held a banner which read, "Is Charlie Curran really a Catholic?"

The lecture was divided into two sections. The first was the prepared speech by Curran. The second section of the lecture was a one-hour question and answer session with the audience. The lecture concentrated more specifically on academic freedom, while the questions varied from specific questions on his positions to questions concerning the correct role of a theologian.

Curran was asked how he was able to separate his duties as both a priest and a theologian. He said that it was through his actions. He added that many people inquired as to why he did not normally wear a Roman collar and he allowed people to call him by his first name. He responded, "Because Jesus did."

When asked about his controversial viewpoints, he responded that the discussion will always go on within the Church. He said it is the theologians that raise the problems and added, "If we don't raise the problems, the faith dies."

Curran's speech was clearly outlined by him at the outset. The areas he spoke of in the speech included historical setting and an overview of academic freedom, the recent events within the academic freedom arena, questions about the future of academic freedom, developments within Curran's own case and three specific questions about the future of academic freedom.

Curran explained that historically, academic freedom in the United States was controlled by governing boards which ran the schools. He said, "The threat to academic freedom in the United States precisely came from these boards of governors who thought that faculty were employees that they could hire and fire at will if they didn't like what they were doing."

Villanova escapes computer viruses

By PATRICK MOUSSEAU
Staff Reporter

The computer virus that jammed 6,000 of the country's computer networks left the mainframe computer system at Villanova untouched, said Najib Nadi, computer science graduate professor and systems programmer for the mathematics department.

The virus, which is being called the country's most serious computer virus attack, affected only UNIX SUN and VAX Systems.

Villanova communicates with CSNET and BIT NET Systems, said Nadi.

The virus, which was created on Nov. 2 by Robert Morris Jr. a Cornell University graduate student, was possibly his attempt at an intellectual challenge and an opportunity to show the flaws in the UNIX System, according to the New York Times.

A virus is a computer program that enters into other computer terminals disguised as a harmless piece of information. Once inside the computer, the harmless program mutates into a rogue program which usually causes destruction, said Nadi.

The virus, which affected thousands of computer networks, was sent through Sendmail, a feature of the Arpanet. The Arpanet is the link that connects computer networks of military bases, research centers and universities, said Nadi.

Sendmail is used to exchange messages among computer users. Entering through a "hole" in the Sendmail system, the virus was able to place itself in personal files

Teaching profession makes a comeback

By JENNIFER REIDY
Senior Reporter

"Education experts agree that rising salaries, better working conditions and a renewed respect for the teaching profession have, in just a few brief years, prompted a substantial increase in students seeking teaching degrees," reported an article in the Nov. 6 issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Villanova has seen a "substantial increase" over the past three or four years in the number of students who seek to obtain a degree in education, according to Dr. Henry O. Nichols, education chairman.

"There has been an increase in the amount of freshmen applicants, students who transfer [to the education major] from other majors and those students who desire an education minor," he said.

A 1983 report by the National Commission on Excellence in Education titled "A Nation At Risk" asserted that "the educational foundations of our society are presently being eroded by a rising tide of mediocrity that threatens our very future as a nation and a people.

"We have, in effect, been committing an act of unthinking, unilateral educational disarmament," the report stated.

The commission also found that "not enough of the academically able students are being attracted to teaching; that teacher preparation programs need substantial improvement; that the professional working life of teachers is on the whole unacceptable; and that a serious shortage of teachers exists in key fields."

The revived interest in the teaching profession is due partly to the "A Nation At Risk" report and others like it, Nichols said. "The focus on education as a whole brought out by these reports has certainly brought attention back to teaching. Of course, the salary increases are also a big factor, as well as the increasing demand for teachers, since there are more children," he commented.

According to the Inquirer, the number of students seeking teaching degrees had plummeted from 167,000 in 1975 to 88,200 in 1985.

He described that many teachers became "demoralized" by the system. "Many of the veteran teachers who used to be respected and honored suddenly lost this respect. They taught because they loved it — certainly not because of the money. When they lost this respect, they lost the motivation to be teachers," Nichols explained.

He cited changes in societal attitudes as a contributing factor to teacher "demoralization." "The nature of students, as a cause of society, has changed, due to drugs, lack of respect for authority and permissiveness. We've never had a generation of kids come through what they're coming through now in terms of societal pressures," Nichols noted.

"These factors definitely affect students' ability to learn. Society somehow expects schools to take care of these problems, and it's hard to deal with these problems and teach math at the same time," he said.

Nichols commented on the lack of discipline present in today's

Parking problems persist

By SHEILA COURTER
Staff Reporter

Several faculty and students are displeased with the University's parking policy, which states that lost or stolen hang tags must be replaced at full cost.

Dr. Hafeez Malik, political science professor, questioned the policy after he reported his parking tag stolen on campus.

Malik later found the parking tag in his car and his money was refunded. Despite this, he said that by having to pay full price for a new tag he was being "penalized for being a victim ... this policy should be changed."

Malik said he does not object to a replacement fee to reproduce the lost or stolen tags, but said that imposing an equal amount of money to replace the tag "reverses the norms of justice."

He said the fee paid is for the privilege to park. It is not a commodity. If the tag is missing, Malik said one should not have to pay for the privilege to park again.

Dr. Gerald M. MacDonald, geography professor, said that faculty should be provided with assured parking which he said is necessary for teachers and staff. He also said that parking issues should be University policy, not Security policy.

Malik compared a lost tag to a lost driver's license. He said if one loses his licenses, he can replace it by paying an appropriate fee which is not punitive. He said he would change the policy by charging a reasonable replacement fee.

Chief Rowan P. Kelly, director of Security, said statistics over the past three years have shown a substantial drop in the number of parking tags reported lost or stolen.

Malik said that this number is irrelevant. This number should be broken down "indicating stolen or lost cases by faculty, students, and staff," otherwise, the blame lies upon the faculty alone, he said.

Malik said the students and faculty are a responsible group of people who are not apt to abuse the policy.

The updated 1988 parking regulations state: "If you report your hang tag lost or stolen, you will have to buy another one. It is up to you to safeguard your property by keeping your vehicle locked." Kelly said that this parking regulation is clearly stated.

The parking policy was presented by Kelly to former University President the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., three years ago. Since the policy's installment, the number of reported lost or stolen tags has dropped from between 300 and 400 to 26 as of Oct. 11, Kelly said.

Stolen tags were included in this policy because it is up to the car owner to secure his car, Kelly said. If this is done, he said the chances of a hang tag being stolen are greatly reduced.

The tag itself is a constant reminder to secure one's vehicle since there is a printed reminder on both sides of the tag.

Kelly said that if the car owner had locked his car, a break-in would only be possible by breaking the windows.

The parking policy that lost or stolen hang tags must be replaced at full cost has been criticized by faculty and students. Chief Rowan P. Kelly, director of Security, said that it is simply trying to provide spaces for those who need them.

New faculty senator selected

Dr. Emily M. Binns, religious studies professor, was recently elected faculty arts senator to the University Senate.

Binns defeated Dr. John J. Schrems, political science chairman, by a faculty vote of 87-60, said Carolyn Lea, University Senate secretary.

The Rev. Edward Hamel, O.S.A., religious studies professor, and Dr. Priscilla G. Hopkirk, political science professor, also originally ran for the position. However, their candidacies were eliminated during two run-off elections.

Lea said that a majority vote is necessary for election, and that none of the four faculty members gained a majority until the final vote between Binns and Schrems.

Honor society elects officers

The University chapter of Beta Gamma Sigma, a national honor society for College of Commerce and Finance students, recently elected its officers for the 1988-89 academic year.

Seniors David Walsh, Jeffrey Farkas and Alice Morrissey were selected as president, vice president and treasurer, respectively. A banquet for the induction of the society's new members will take place in May 1989.

Established at the University during the 1975-76 academic year, the chapter is part of a national organization which celebrated its 75th anniversary last year.

Membership includes students in the College of Commerce and Finance in the upper 5 to 10 percent of their class, as well as the top 20 percent of graduate students receiving master's degrees.

Lindback committee set up

By SINEAD QUINN
Assistant News Editor

A committee has been set up in order to devise a more effective procedure for nominating and electing the recipients of the annual Christian R. and Mary F. Lindback Foundation awards for distinguished teaching, according to Dr. John A. Doody, philosophy department chairman.

The committee, chaired by Doody, was put together by the faculty affairs committee in response to a letter signed by five previous award winners which was sent to the faculty council. It alleged undue influence by teachers in order to encourage students to vote for them, said Doody.

The Lindback award has been presented to two exemplary teachers each year for the past 29 years.

The award, which is presented to teachers from a number of Delaware Valley schools, confers a $1,000 grant to each of the winners.

The nomination procedure has changed from year to year, but most recently, the process has involved a general election that allows sophomores, juniors, seniors and each faculty member to nominate three teachers.

The foundation stipulates that it is the university president's responsibility to choose the recipients. The election serves to narrow the president's choices to five nominees.

Customarily, he chooses the teachers receiving the highest number of votes, Doody said.

The election itself is overseen by the faculty affairs committee and the Blue Key Society. Dr. Joseph Georgé, chairman of the general arts department, heads the faculty affairs committee on this matter.

George said he felt the system is somewhat flawed by its own nature.

"The Lindback award is a very prestigious award and many of the students do not appreciate the tremendous significance of it," George said. "Only about 10 percent of the students vote and about 50 percent of the faculty votes."

George said that because students and faculty choose from such a large number of teachers, it is possible to win with approximately 30 votes. This makes it possible for a teacher to simply request that his or her students nominate him or her in exchange for points or a higher grade, George added.

He re-emphasized how important the award is to a teacher. "The cash award of $1,000 is insignificant in relation to the prestige of the award. The award can lead to merit increments, promotions or receiving tenure," he said.

Doody, former chairman of the faculty council, said the previous award recipients claimed in the letter that they were aware of teachers offering points in exchange for votes. He also mentioned that there were similar rumors circulating among students.

"While the charges may or may not be true, the rumor itself demeans the award," George commented.

Meal plan issue examined

By JENN LUNDGREN
Staff Reporter

Meal cards are nontransferable to protect resident students from an additional financial burden next year, according to J. Les Gies, director of Food Services.

Gies explained that the University calculates that most residents eat approximately 12 meals a week, but they are entitled to 20 meals. Gies said this system balances out since some students attend more than 12 meals, and others eat less than 12 meals a week.

Food Services is operating at a profit, which Gies said goes toward the improvement of the dining halls. He said that if the meal card was transferable then there would not be a balance. Gies added that would inevitably cause an increase in the annual cost of room and board.

Presently there is a committee of members of Student Life that is discussing the practicalities of different meal plans. One idea being considered would offer a 15-meal plan and close the dining halls during the weekend.

Gies said, "Villanova is a suitcase school, as most students live close enough to home to leave on the weekend."

Another alternative Gies said, would be to have one dining hall open on weekends at which students would pay cash for the meals they attend.

No plans are in order for expanding Donahue Hall to accommodate the addition of two dormitories on south campus, he said.

The decision to prohibit taking food out of the dining halls this year was made by members of Student Life, primarily because of the excessive waste and trash that resulted last year. Also, the meal checkers were not able to enforce the limit of just two items being taken out, said Gies.

The increase in room and board might be slightly lessened next year, assuming the University uses the present meal plan and that there is a decrease in the amount of waste this year, said Gies.

Guest tickets are available to purchase meals for students' friends who come to visit the University. There is a nominal charge which is not comparable to what a resident pays per meal. The ticket can be returned if unused, said Gies.

He said the guest list for each dining hall is limited to 50 students because the dining halls could not physically handle any more students

CATS looks to improve library

By MIRIAM ROBINSON
Staff Reporter

Falvey Memorial Library staff has recently created the Coalition Against Thoughtless Students (CATS) program in an attempt to improve library habits among Villanovan students, said Louise Green, assistant director for public services.

The library staff is facing problems due to many students' lack of respect for the library and the resource materials it contains. The staff is concerned with students mutilating and stealing books, for instance. Other problems include food in the library and high noise levels, she said.

Green said not much had previously been done to solve these problems. With the creation of CATS, there is hope that students will be more aware of their actions and that new ways can be found to improve the library.

One step to a better library has been introduced by the installation of a new security system, she said. This system electronically detects if someone walking out of the library has a book that has not been checked out.

Since last May, the staff has worked to code library materials in this system. This is a continuing process, as new materials are received constantly, she said. "People have triggered the alarms, so the system is working."

In attempts to cut down on noise in the library, the second floor has been made into a quiet group study area.

The presence of library monitors during the hours when the library is heavily used has also cut down on noise and food problems, Green said.

As far as future improvements for the library, she said a computerized card catalogue is a possibility but does not know exactly when it will be put into effect.

The staff has tried to make CATS known by wearing buttons that say, "Vote CATS."

Staff members have also put up signs in the library, and bookmarks were given out at the beginning of the semester to encourage good habits.

"Not only do students hurt the next person by ripping out pages or writing in books, but everyone suffers because the replacements of these materials takes time and money that could be going into future projects," she explained.

George Bush may face clash with Congress

Democrats gain seats in both Senate and House of Representatives

By HALLIE ZIMMERMAN
Staff Reporter

Many foresee a rocky road ahead for President-elect George Bush. There are speculations as to his agenda and, accordingly, to the relationship he will have with the Democrat-controlled Congress.

Analysis

Immediately following the late returns on election night, which showed Bush defeating Dukakis and the Democrats gaining additional seats in both the Senate and the House, many questioned the relationship between Bush and the new Congress.

A pessimistic projection came from the Senate Minority Leader, Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan.). Dole is a former contender for the presidency and was one of Bush's rivals in the primaries. He said that "this situation is going to spell trouble from day one for George Bush."

The problem with speculating Bush's efficacy in dealing with Congress is that his agenda is still unclear. Last week the president-elect told reporters, "I will take what I think the prime issues of this campaign were and work constructively with Congress to attain the will of the people."

There is little doubt that a mutual "prime issue" for Bush, Congress and the people is the deficit.

During the presidential campaign, Bush repeatedly promised that he would not raise taxes and not impose new fees. Furthermore, he promised to cut the capital gains tax.

However, he has also spoken of improvement in child care, police training and equipment, and of new weapons systems and battle groups.

Syndicated columnist Richard Cohen wrote last week, "Bush's opponent from here on is reality. His opposition is not a man but a budget deficit, a trade deficit, the Third World debt crisis, corroding inner cities and the changing nature of the Soviet challenge."

The Rev. Owen R. Jackson, O.S.A. associate director for the Center of Peace and Justice Education, projects that "Democrats aren't going to let Bush off the hook. If there are new taxes, they're not going to let Bush do it."

Bush's success with Congress will depend heavily upon how conservative an agenda he plans to pursue, as he does not have the popularity nor the communication skills of Ronald Reagan. Conservatives are split over how aggressively conservative Bush will be.

New Hampshire Gov. John Sununu (R.) holds that "George Bush has not only served this president well, but has become a strong advocate for that agenda. He has gone well past what could be called lip service."

Burt Pines of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative Washington-based organization, asked, "Does Bush know in his gut that SDI [Strategic Defense Initiative] is important? I don't know."

Former White House aide Patrick J. Buchanan said he does not believe the president-elect will press for "legislation embodying his views on such social issues as abortion and school prayer."

Some Democratic senators spoke last week of "teaching him a lesson" by blocking whatever initiatives he undertook.

Assuming this occurs, Jackson points out, "You'll get a sort of 'Mexican Standoff.' Who's going to flinch first?"

A more positive outlook came from Bush himself. "I've served in Congress... I will try very hard because I start with a great respect for the institution," he said.

Former Speaker of the House Tip O'Neill predicted that Jim Wright, his successor, will "try hard to find a way to get along with the president-elect."

Most conservatives doubt this as Jim Wright has stood steadfast against a number of conservative legislative efforts such as contra aid and SDI.

No matter how conservative or liberal an agenda Bush follows, Rep. Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) seems to sum up the situation accurately: "All winning an election does is give you permission to get into the middle of the wrestling match."

Court might tilt to right

Three justices to reach 80s

By GAREN MEGUERIAN
Staff Reporter

The scale keeping the liberals and the conservatives balanced in the Supreme Court might tilt toward the right during George Bush's presidency.

The three Justices identified with liberal decisions in the past — William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, and Harry Blackmun — will be in their 80s when President-elect George Bush is sworn in, and all of them could leave during his term.

Dr. Robert Langran, political science professor, said, "Byron White is also likely to leave."

This would allow Bush to appoint up to four Justices for the Supreme Court — more than any president since Richard Nixon. When Nixon was president, he was able to redirect the Supreme Court away from two decades of liberalism by appointing strict constitutionalists to four vacant seats in the Supreme Court.

Blackmun said in an Oct. 3 issue of U.S. News and World Report that a GOP victory in 1988 could make the court "very conservative well into the 21st century."

In this month's issue of Judicature Magazine, Bush said, "I am committed to appointing judges who are dedicated to interpreting the law as it exists, rather than legislating from the bench."

Langran said, "If vacancies occur, Bush will appoint moderate to conservative replacements. If he tries somebody as conservative as Bork, he will have problems getting approval from the Senate."

The biggest conservative target, as seen by Newsweek, will be overturning Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 ruling that made abortion legal.

"There's no way they're going to voluntarily retire," said Dr. Colleen Sheehan, political science professor.

Both Langran and Sheehan doubt whether the three liberals are going to leave their positions. Langran said, "I don't see any significant change in direction. Bush has a chance at making some appointments but only if some of the Justices die."

Curran discusses academic freedom, ideology

"There can be diversity and dissent," he says

By MAUREEN STAPLETON
News Editor

The following is an interview conducted with the Rev. Charles E. Curran, S.T.D., prior to his lecture, "Academic Freedom and Catholic Higher Education" on Nov. 13.

Q: Do you think it is possible to have academic freedom in Catholic universities?

A: Well, I think there are various levels of what you're talking about. But I'll allude to this in the talk. Historically, before 1960, Catholic higher education institutions could not accept academic freedom and did not accept it. A fascinating change occurred in the late 1960s, at which time the leaders of Catholic higher education firmly supported academic freedom and said that Catholic institutions needed it, could have it and could be both universities and Catholic at the same time.

Q: How do the leaders of Catholic institutions insure academic freedom? Is there a balancing act for Catholic schools to uphold certain values and morals?

A: It seems to me what you do is you have to accept that you are a college or a university and that being Catholic adds something distinctive to that, adds something specific to that but it doesn't take away from what you need to be, an American college or university.

So I think you have to be ready to recognize that various groups will come to campus and speak and do things. However, that doesn't mean that other people in the university can't sponsor things they want to do.

I think the Catholic atmosphere can be handled in a few different ways — through campus ministry, making that very strong, through having theology taught on campus — many, many ways you can have the Catholic influence made present.

But I don't think in the end you can deny the need for academic freedom and at times, therefore, you see the difficulty with it is you often wind up defending the rights to speak ... But that you sort of have to educate people to what a university tries to do.

Catholic universities... could be both universities and Catholic at the same time.

The Rev. Charles E. Curran, S.T.D.

Q: Has there been a change in the students' attitudes at Catholic universities? Do students want the Catholic aspect of the university distinct and separate?

A: At Catholic University, I never taught undergraduates, so to ask me that question, I have a difficult time responding to it.

My own basic feeling is that you can be both Catholic and a university at one and the same time, and it seems to be that's a very important thing, in the sense I obviously have dual commitments by who I am to the academy and to the Church. I think that academic freedom should be respected by the Church and accepted by the Church and in the last analysis, I think it's a good thing for the Church and is beneficial to the Church.

We ultimately have to learn to live with some of the tension and problems that it is going to create and we have to educate people as to what function the university is. With regard to how individual Catholics or students would feel, I just don't know. As I said, I in no way want to downplay the Catholic part.

Q: After teaching at Catholic University, how did you like Cornell University and how do you like University of Southern California now?

A: The environments are quite different. Like I said, I never taught undergraduates.

Q: Are you teaching undergraduates now?

A: I have 102 undergraduates in one course. Obviously it's a much more diverse student body. Even in my graduate seminar, out of 12 people there are two Buddhists. There is a much greater diversity. I have found that I have enjoyed the undergraduate teaching, actually. I think that people are not afraid to ask questions that might sound dumb to graduate students at times but that do raise some interesting questions.

The Church has changed already insofar that many people in the Church already disagree with the official Church teaching.

The Rev. Charles E. Curran, S.T.D.

Q: What are you teaching now?

A: I'm teaching two courses this semester, "Human Values and Religion in American Public Life" and a doctoral seminar on Catholic social ethics.

Q: During the height of your controversy in 1986, many things were brought to light about American Catholicism that people never really thought about before. My personal speculation is that Americans are exposed to many more religions and as a result, Americans have a different attitude about their religion and they don't take what the Vatican has to say very seriously. Do you think that attitude is present in America?

A: Well, I think two things about it. One that agrees with you and one that disagrees with you.

Interestingly enough, the Catholic Church, I think, has flourished in the pluralistic society of the United States. I think American Catholics take their religion more seriously than many Catholics in "Catholic countries" in Europe like France and Italy, so I think there's that aspect to it.

Secondly, I also think, though that what you point out is accurate and it's basically behind the positions that I have taken to say, that I think we have to recognize within Church teaching there are some things that are core and central to the faith and other things that are further removed.

And with those issues which are further removed, we have to recognize there can be diversity and dissent. I would think probably in the future we'll have to live with much greater diversity than we do at the present time, and therefore everything that I have done, I have tried also, you might say, to model how dissent should take place.

I think we have to be able to recognize that within the Catholic Church we are going to be disagreeing with one another at times about specific issues. We have to learn how to disagree without being disagreeable. We have to be able to accept the unity that we have in the Church. With that unity we have to learn to live

We have to learn how to disagree without being disagreeable with greater diversity. In many ways that's probably the challenge we're going to face more and more in the future.

That's why I have thought in this whole experience of mine it was important to, they say, mirror and model how dissent should take place without calling people names, without hysterics, trying to preserve the unity and the love of the church within the Church but allowing for disagreement at the same time.

Q: Do you think the church is open to dissent or disagreement about their authoritative (or non-infallible) teachings, and if they are, do you think they will ever take any steps to change their teachings? For example, your stand on artificial contraception, do you think it would ever be possible to change their views on that issue?

Curran

That all changed, Curran explained, in the late 1960s when Catholic universities began to redefine their identity.

In July of 1967, 26 leaders from Catholic institutions nationwide issued the Land 'O the Lakes statement. It read, "The Catholic university today must be a university in the full modern sense of the word with a strong commitment to and concern for academic excellence."

Curran also explained his own case and the conflict of academic freedom at the Catholic University of America. He said that he did not see his personal case as a threat to Catholic higher education because of the different circumstances involved in his case. The special circumstances include sitting cardinals on the board of trustees of Catholic University and the fact that Catholic University is the only American university chartered by the Vatican.

He is now suing the university because he contests that his removal from the theology department without due process or a hearing by his peers is a direct violation of academic freedom as it is understood by all Catholic institutions in the United States.

Curran further explained that the position of the Catholic bishops is changing from that of the late 1960s. He said that some bishops are "fearful" about the extent of academic freedom in Catholic higher education. He said there is an "interesting change," some bishops are taking the position that "full academic freedom cannot and will not exist."

In regard to the exact future of academic freedom in the United States, he responded, "It's hard enough to be a theologian these days, I can't be a prophet."

A: I would hope, ultimately, they would. You might almost, you see, from the very beginning I said I wanted my experience to be a teaching moment to make Catholics recognize the different levels of teaching of the Church.

As I say, the fact that agreement should exist on those things that are core and central to the faith but on those things that are further removed there can be room for disagreement.

I personally think the official Church teaching can and should change on these issues. I think it's also, in one sense, you might say that the Church has changed already insofar that many people in the Church already disagree with the official Church teaching.

Q: How did you personally feel about the conflict with Catholic University in 1986 and the controversy which ensued?

A: On the one hand, I had some time to prepare for it, what happened in '86. I knew this investigation had been going on and what might happen with it.

I was certainly very pleased with the amount of support I got from other Catholic theologians, my own colleagues, my own students, et cetera. That was a very helpful thing.

On the other hand, I think I have talked on this campus six, seven times maybe, and the paper never bothered to interview me before and I assume three years from now that the paper won't bother to interview me either.

People can disagree with those things that are not core and central to the faith and still consider themselves good Catholics.

The Rev. Charles E. Curran, S.T.D.

In the last analysis, I'm not a celebrity, I'm primarily a theologian and I think the important thing for me is to continue to do my theological work. I think I've done what I thought I had to do in terms of the situation, but in the last analysis I know what I should be doing is theology. That's what I hope to do.

Q: Do you think much more understanding has come about?

A: As I said, I would hope so, and I said in the beginning I did want to make it a teaching moment for people to realize there are different levels of teaching in the Church, and that people can disagree with those things that are not core and central to the faith and still consider themselves good Catholics.

Brown students protest rapes

Still another campus erupted in anger to protest multiple rapes near the school.

About 100 Brown University students gathered Nov. 2 to protest two recent rapes near their Providence, R.I. campus, and to call for better security for women.

"On campus and in the Providence community as a whole," student Kathy Hathaway told the gathering, which she organized, "there's been so much emotion, but no forum to release the emotion. We wanted to provide that arena."

At the "speak out," about 25 Brown women told about how they had been victimized in the past.

Two Brown women were raped within two weeks in October. Police suspect the same assailant committed both crimes, but have made no arrests yet.

Women college grads generous

Graduates of women's colleges are nearly twice as likely to donate to their schools as are men and women graduates of coeducational schools.

The women graduates' desire to "give back" to their schools was reported in a study last week by the Women's College Coalition of Washington, D.C., a nonprofit group representing 70 schools.

About four of every 10 women's college alumnae made some sort of donation to their alma maters in 1987-88, compared to two of every 10 graduates of coeducational colleges, the census of 405 colleges and universities found.

The women's gifts, moreover, were an average of 26 percent more than those given by coeducational campus alums.

Indiana U. scorns serenade

Indiana University's (IU) dormitory government last week disciplined an all-male dormitory floor for serenading a women's floor with a sexually suggestive song that contained "vulgar language."

"They interfered with the students' right to be free from sexual harassment while inside their houses," ruled Rob Murphy of IU's Residence Hall Association Judicial Board.

About 35 residents of the all-male floor, named Dodds House, sang what Dodds officer Mike Milausnic said residents had been singing for 20 years as "an ice breaker for setting up social events with female residents" during Homecoming weekends.

Dodd's student judges put Dodds on probation through the rest of the school year. If residents misbehave in the meantime, they could be slapped with further sanctions ranging from social restrictions to suspension.

The Resident Student Association (RSA) will be sponsoring Operation Identification, a personal security program to help residents engrave their personal belongings, from Nov. 29-Dec. 1.

This service is provided in conjunction with the University's Security department. Students will be given the opportunity to protect their valuables by having their social security numbers engraved on their items, said Pete Kouveliotes, environmental officer of the RSA.

Kouveliotes is heading the drive. He said he will circulate the engraving devices, along with a set of information cards, among a group of house councilmembers.

These cards will be used so that students may list their valuables along with their identification. One card will be kept on file in the Security office and a duplicate will be left with the student, he said.

The house council advisors for each of the residence halls will schedule a time and place for their residents to have items engraved.

RSA Advisor Dan Remley said the program was initiated in the fall of 1985.

Chief Rowan P. Kelly, director of Security, said there are approximately 400 to 500 cards on file, dating to the program's origination. "Though last year had the biggest participation, there is still potential to do much better," said Kelly.

He said Operation Identification has never aided in the recovery of stolen valuables, but this does not imply that any registered item has ever been stolen. If an item were missing, the student would be advised to consult local police along with Operation Identification.

Kouveliotes said he is placing a large emphasis on increasing participation in the program. "To make the service work, people have to want for it to work, so they need to know about it," he said.

Any questions about the program should be addressed to Kouveliotes in the RSA office in 215 Dougherty Hall.

Foreign students increase

By College Press Service

A record number of foreign students enrolled at American colleges last year, and more than half of them were from Asian countries, the Institute of International Education (IIE) announced last week.

In all, some 356,200 of the 12,500,000 students who registered for college classes during the 1987-88 school year were foreign residents. More than half came from Taiwan, China, India, Korea, Malaysia and Japan, the IIE said.

"The economies of the Asian countries are flourishing," explained Marie Zikopoulis, editor of the IIE's "Open Doors: 1987-88."

More Asian students, in other words, now can afford to come to the United States, Zikopoulis said.

In addition, "Korea and China have liberalized their policies about sending students abroad. This accounts for the big jumps [in the number of students] from those two countries," said Zikopoulis.

Korea sent 20,250 students to study here, 2.9 percent more than last year, while China sent 25,200 students, an increase of 26 percent.

Zikopoulis added that Japanese students who can not crack some of the exclusive campuses at home — where a student's college sometimes is determined while he or she is still in elementary school — often opt for United States colleges.

Some 18,050 Japanese enrolled in the United States in 1987-88, a 19.8 percent jump since last year, the IIE report showed.

At the same time, however, other parts of the world are sending fewer students to the United States. For example, students from Middle Eastern countries, who once made up 30 percent of all the foreign students in the United States, now number 43,640, a decline of 7.1 percent from last year.

"For the next few years, the trend [of more students from Asia] will continue," Zikopoulis said.

More students attracted to teaching jobs schools. "If a student disrupts a class or is caught smoking in the john, and he's back in the classroom the next day, what message does that send?" he asked.

"There is a pervading attitude that 'the student is always right,' he said.

"Teachers are trying to do an impossible job — they are trying to teach each and every U.S. citizen. That task is overwhelming ... and townships pay maintenance and sanitation workers more than teachers. Hopefully that's being changed now," Nichols concluded.

The Inquirer cited a survey by the National Education Association on teacher salary trends, which found that the average salary for a public school teacher doubled in the last decade, to $28,031 last year. Teachers in New Jersey made $30,788 last year, while Delaware teachers earned $29,573 and Pennsylvania teachers made $29,177, according to the American Federation of Teachers.

Millions illiterate

The "A Nation At Risk" report revealed that 23 million Americans are "functionally illiterate by the simplest tests of everyday reading, writing and comprehension ... About 13 percent of all 17-year-olds in the United States can be considered functionally illiterate. Functional illiteracy among minority youth may run as high as 40 percent.

"International comparisons of student achievement, completed a decade ago, reveal that on 19 academic tests American students were never first or second, and in comparison with other industrialized nations, were last seven times," the report showed.

The commission noted a shortage of mathematics and science teachers and quoted an educational researcher, who said, "We are raising a new generation of Americans that is scientifically and technologically illiterate."

The report also cited another expert, who said, "Each generation of Americans has outstripped its parents in education, in literacy, and in economic attainment. For the first time in the history of our country, the educational skills of one generation will not surpass, will not equal, will not even approach, those of their parents."

Changes in society

An article in the Nov. 14 edition of Time magazine titled "Who's Teaching Our Children?" noted that today, demands on teachers have multiplied. "Drugs, sex, violence, broken homes, poverty: today's classroom is a mirror of the crises that afflict the U.S. as a whole," it stated.

The article continued, "Against such corrosive influences, it is increasingly teachers — not parents — who are called upon to function as society's first line of defense.

"The prim, bespectacled schoolmarm, standing at the head of a well-scrubbed, disciplined class, is a stereotype from a bygone era. Today, most high school students have had more experience with alcohol, drugs and sex than she ever could have imagined," the article stated.

The Time article also pointed to the problem of inequities in school financing. "In most states, schools are supported by a combination of property taxes and state and federal grants. The formula ensures gleaming beakers and well-stocked libraries for schools in wealthier states and neighborhoods but leaves many rural and inner-city schools with peeling paint and leaky pipes," it explained.

The article quoted one teacher who said, "The world sends messages to our kids about the importance it places on education. Go to shopping malls and see how nice they are. Then look at the desks in our classrooms, and you see nails coming through the bottom of the seats."

Stricter requirements for student teachers

Education experts are advocating stricter requirements for students seeking a teaching degree, according to the article in Time. It stated, "Concerned about an alleged epidemic of incompetency, legislatures in 46 states have enacted tougher training requirements for teachers, including minimum college grade point averages."

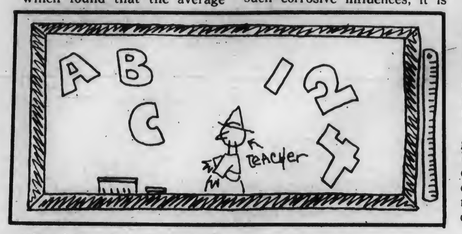
The "A Nation At Risk" report also stressed that "persons preparing to teach should be required to meet high educational standards, to demonstrate an aptitude for teaching, and to demonstrate competence in an academic discipline."

Education majors at Villanova are required to maintain a 2.5 grade point average in order to remain in the program, Nichols said. "Our student teachers rank the best in preparation and abilities in the classroom, and we've received excellent feedback from the school districts that hire Villanova graduates."

Brighter future

The Time article reported that "five years after 'A Nation At Risk' prompted a flurry of reform, average scores on the Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) have risen 11 points."

Many teachers are still content with their choice of career despite their frustrations, according to Time. One teacher commented in the article, "I love my job. In the classroom I can have an impact."



Virus plagues computers

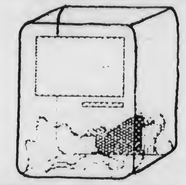
and also be disguised as the "superuser" in the computers' internal control, said Nadi.

The virus program was created not to destroy files as certain viruses can, but to remain dormant in the terminals. However, there was a misjudgment in calculations and the virus duplicated itself thousands of times in each terminal, said the Times.

The computers slowed to a grind or completely stopped because the memory banks were depleted in the duplicating process, said Nadi. Memory banks are necessary for the operation of a computer, he added.

The Villanova computer network is connected to the CSNET terminal in Massachusetts and was not affected by the Arpanet virus, said Rick Green, a junior computer science major and senior consultant for the University Computer Information System.

The method of removal of a virus is to send a patch to cover the "hole," thereby containing the virus but not curing it. Ridding the system of the virus is done by releasing an anti-virus program, which looks for and kills other viruses, said Green.



Computer viruses are self destructive programs.

There was no destruction to the computers or direct loss of money by the "Morris virus," only loss in the form of manpower hours used to remove it.

This virus sends a message to the computer world to improve security, a positive situation, said Nadi, who is against punishment of Morris.

Green is for a "controlled" punishment to deter other would-be hackers.
